Reviving the Carmel

Some 1,000 soldiers from the Israel Defence Forces' Nahal unit took part in the cleanup and restoration of the nature paths on Mount Carmel. In addition to the 44 lives that were lost, more than 4,000 hectares of forest were destroyed in a fire there last month.

Hamas 'will never recognize Israel'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas will never recognize Israel, Gaza leader Ismail Haniyeh said last week at a rally to mark the 23rd anniversary of the militant group's founding.

"We say it with confidence as we said it five years ago when we formed our government, and we say it today – we will never recognize Israel," Haniyeh told a crowd in Gaza City numbering tens of thousands.

"Hamas will be the faithful guard of the Palestinian people's rights and the basic Palestinian principles," Haniyeh continued.

"We say today that there will be no occupation of the land of Palestine and then we can say there is no future for the occupation on our land. I mean from the sea to the river and from Rafah up to Naqoora."

"This year the rally is different from previous rallies. We want to send a message to the world and to the Zionist enemy that the Hamas movement is a powerful Islamic Palestinian movement which can never be uprooted," a rally organizer, who gave his name as Abu Hamza, said.

Doctor Sues Israel

TORONTO — A Palestinian gynecologist now living in Toronto who's known for preaching reconciliation is suing Israel for the deaths of three daughters and a niece in the Gaza war in January 2009. Izzeldin Abuelaish, who has worked in Israeli hospitals and came to Canada with his surviving children after the war, told Ynet News that he didn't want to file the lawsuit, but Israel's refusal to recognize his loss and compensate him forced his hand. He said he told his lawyer to reach a settlement with the Israel Defence Forces, which admits it fired two shells into his Gaza home on Jan. 16, 2009, but refuses him compensation for what it calls an operation of war. Abuelaish, a University of Toronto medical professor, spoke at Beth Tzedec Congregation in November on the need for peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

Israel Critic Dies

TORONTO — A Jewish York University history professor who was an outspoken critic of Israel died unexpectedly of natural causes Dec. 25, the Globe and Mail reported. Last year, David Noble, 65, called Hillel an agent of a foreign government and urged York to ban the student group. He also dropped a lawsuit against Canadian Jewish Congress about a 2004 flyer he published that CJC said was antisemitic. The flyer said the board of York's fundraising foundation was "biased by the presence and influence of staunch pro-Israel lobbyists, activists and fundraising agencies." Noble also campaigned against York's former policy of closing on the High Holidays.

Arson Suspected

TORONTO — Police suspect an incendiary device thrown through a front window caused a fire that destroyed a well-known jewelry store early in the morning of Dec. 23. The Ontario Fire Marshal was looking at video surveillance recordings last week, but no arrests had been made in connection with the blaze at Harold the Jewellery Buyer on Bathurst Street. Located in a Jewish area, the store, owned by Harold Gerstel, sits kitty-corner to a rival store whose owner, a fellow congregant at a nearby shul, alleges a hitman was hired to kill him. One of Gerstel's employees was charged in the alleged plot, but Gerstel has not been charged.

Antisemitic Website Back Online

TORONTO — A website in Canada that advocated mass killing of Jews is back online after being shut down.

"Filthy Jewish Terrorists," operated by former York University student Salman An-Noor Hossain, reportedly is using a host in Switzerland. Its Canadian web provider had shut down the site in March.

York suspended him, and it's believed he's left Canada.

Hossain's site, the subject of a five-month investigation by the Ontario Provincial Police, had called for direct terror attacks and said Jews should be "exterminated." Last summer, the OPP said Hossain "wilfully promoted hatred and advocated genocide of the Jewish community," and he was charged with five counts of hate crimes, but he skipped his court date.

In November, an Ontario court issued a warrant for Hossain's arrest on Interpol, the international police agency.

Hossain posted a blog Dec. 21 identifying himself as the operator of the relaunched site. But reports say the new website is registered with generic information, making it impossible to locate him.

Alleged Spy Executed

TEHRAN — Iran has executed a man convicted of spying for Israel. Ali-Akbar Siadat was hanged in Tehran Dec. 28, according to the state Iranian news agency IRNA. He had been found guilty of passing information about Iran's military to the Mossad, Israel's spy agency. He was arrested in 2008 while trying to leave the country with his wife and 29 pages of classified material. Siadat was charged with "supporting the Zionist regime" by meeting with Israeli agents over a period of six years in countries such as Turkey, Thailand and the Netherlands. On Dec. 26, another Iranian was sentenced to death for working as a spy for Israel. In November 2008, Iran executed an Iranian telecom salesman convicted of spying for Israel.

Que. daycare religion ban upsets community

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec's outlawing of religious instruction in government-funded daycares will have a "devastating effect," says the organization that represents 23 centres associated with the Jewish community.

The Association of Child Care Centres of the Jewish Community along with Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC), Federation CJA and the Association of Jewish Day Schools are looking at their options to challenge the new regulations, announced Dec. 17, including going to court.

Their position is that the subsidized daycares are "not mandated to promote secularism" and that those under Jewish auspices have a responsibility to instil a sense of Jewish identity in children that age.

The association plans to call a meeting some time this month of all its centre representatives and parents to discuss what to do next, director Chana Rosenberg said.

While the daycares serving the chassidic and Orthodox communities will have the most difficulty complying, Rosenberg said all of the centres would have to significantly alter their activities, including, for example, abandoning weekly Shabbat observance.

Adam Atlas

There are about 2,200 children in the association's daycares, which are mostly based at schools, synagogues and the YM-YWHA. Rosenberg estimates another 1,000 Jewish children, mainly chassidic, are in other subsidized daycare.

Some have existed since the network of Centres de la petite enfance (CPEs) was created by the government in 1997.

QJC president Adam Atlas said that the government has not taken into consideration the concerns that the Jewish community has expressed over the past months.

"We deplore the fact that the directive reduces Judaism to a strictly religious dimension," he stated.

The new regulations, announced by Family Minister Yolande James, mean the end of any educational activity the government considers as the inculcation of "a belief or dogma or the practise of a specific religion."

Christmas trees or Chanukah menorahs, however, are permissible, as are holiday celebrations that stick to the "cultural aspects," not the underlying religion, but not too many or too often.

The directive also speaks of ensuring that admission to any subsidized daycare is unrelated to a child's religious origin, but it doesn't state how that would be enforced. Spots at the province's CPEs typically have waiting lists.

The new rules apply equally to the $7-a-day CPEs and to those private daycares that receive public subsidies.

If they don't comply by June 1, their funding could be reduced or withdrawn. James said the number of inspectors in her department has been tripled.

"Daycare services are places of socialization and integration for our toddlers from 0 to 5 years of age. I want young Quebecers who frequent our daycare services to be able to do so in with a perspective of openness to other people and to diversity," James said in a press statement.

"The government's will is clear: we will subsidize daycare services in which the educational objectives do not include the learning of a specific religion."

'We rely on our people'

Israeli Air Force (IAF) commander Maj.-Gen. Ido Nehushtan spoke to the Israeli media last week talking about the "look-ahead" at the projected strategic challenges facing Israel in the new year.

The IAF's greatest challenge, he said, was the military buildup on Israel's different fronts: by Hamas in the Gaza Strip, Hezbollah in Lebanon and in Syria and, of course, by the now perpetually worrisome leaders in Iran.

Nehushtan predicted that 2011 will be a "critical year" for stopping Iran's drive to develop a nuclear weapon.

From the editor's desk...

We have heard that said before by other Israelis in positions of authority and knowledge. And we saw that the Iranian drive to develop a nuclear weapon was indeed set back this past year due to various failures of the relevant Iranian computer systems and especially due to the disappearance of certain Iranian nuclear scientists.

How much longer Tehran's nuclear program can be stalled, however, will only be known by judging the ultimate result. There is no doubting the accuracy of the commander's prediction that the steps taken by the international community and/or Israel in the upcoming year will play a critical role in the advance or the arrest of the Iranian program.

Due to the frightening nature and the eschatological purposes of the arsenal that Tehran is pursuing, the danger the Iranian regime represents to Israel is unprecedented in the Jewish state's young history.

Since its birth nearly 63 years ago, there has never been an abatement, with the arrival of each new year, in the level of vigilance and wariness required by the country's defence forces in protecting its people.

Israel remains the only member country among the 192 in the General Assembly whose right to exist as a sovereign state is still challenged by other member states of the GA. They do so, of course, in total violation of the United Nations charter to which, in theory, they have pledged their allegiance.

In addition to the military threats that the Jewish state will face in the upcoming year, there is also a significant diplomatic threat that looms on the horizon like a heavy cloud about to storm.

The Palestinian Authority (PA) has threatened to unilaterally declare statehood rather than continue with the process of negotiating a path to statehood. That doing so would entirely run afoul of their previously signed commitments does not bother their consciences.

Their purpose in doing so would be twofold: to avoid having to make the compromises required in bona fide bilateral bargaining; and to bring pressure to bear on the Security Council and especially upon the United States, both of whom would be asked to decide upon the legal validity of such a unilateral declaration.

Aiding and abetting the PA thus far in their cleverly devious, and effective, enterprise have been Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Ecuador.

Last month, outgoing Brazilian president Lula da Silva said he would recognize an independent Palestine. He praised the "legitimate aspiration of the Palestinian people for a secure, united, democratic, and economically viable state coexisting peacefully with Israel." As soon as they heard the Brazilian statement, Argentina, Uruguay and Ecuador quickly did the same.

More states, especially from South America where Brazil wields considerable influence, will undoubtedly follow suit in the weeks and months to come. Readers will not be surprised to know that former U.S. president Jimmy Carter was among the very first individuals to send a congratulatory note to Lula.

Given the reflexive support that the PA has among so many nations of the world, it can be expected that P.A. President Mahmoud Abbas' decision to abjure negotiations with Israel will gain increasing acceptance around the diplomatic world. Worse, the diplomatic world will blame Israel for having "forced" the Palestinians to walk away from the negotiating table. His prevarications and dishonesty will be viewed as courage and conviction, indeed as the only reasonable step he could have taken in the face of Israel's refusal to avoid building homes in east Jerusalem and the West Bank.

"We rely on our people," IAF commander Ido Nehushtan emphasized at the press conference last week, to provide Israel with "a qualitative edge" over its enemies.

We must all understand and realize that we are part of the people to whom he refers. We all have a role to play in standing up for Israel.

Rabbi Allen to leave Beth Tikvah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Wayne Allen

Rabbi Wayne Allen is stepping down as senior rabbi of Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

On Jan. 1, he began an 18-month sabbatical that will last until the end of his contract in June 2012, when he will have been with the congregation for 25 years.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover, the shul's assistant rabbi, is leading the congregation, which has more than 1,300 member families, and the board also plans to invite an interim rabbi to serve, shul president Maurice Kulik told The CJN.

Kulik added that the synagogue, which is located on Bayview Avenue, is going through an "evaluation of when, and who, and what direction the synagogue will take in terms of ritual orientation."

"We're going to consult the membership to see which way halachically the membership wants to move for the years ahead."

In a news release, Kulik said that Rabbi Allen would be missed, but he recognized the contribution the rabbi can make to the larger community.

Rabbi Allen told The CJN that a combination of factors led to his decision in November.

"With the earning of my PhD [earlier this year], I had [academic] vistas open up to me that previously were not, and there are internal factors in the synagogue that suggest it would be a good time to move on," he said.

He didn't elaborate on the latter, except to say that his decision, which he said he came to "with consultation with the leadership of the synagogue," did not arise from philosophical differences between him and the congregation.

Nor did they have to do with philosophical differences between him and the Conservative movement, which has become more liberal since his ordination, said the rabbi, who was honoured by the Union for Traditional Judaism with its Chaver Ne'eman Award in 2006. He serves as the organization's vice-president.

Rabbi Allen, 59, will continue to have an office at Beth Tikvah until August, he said, adding that he may not be in Toronto for the entirety of his sabbatical.

The rabbi, who was ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1977, is working on three books – the publication of his doctoral thesis, a book on the fundamental values of Judaism, and a second volume on Jewish law and contemporary issues to follow a book that came out last year.

He will continue to teach the Introduction to Judaism class offered by the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region. It will be held at Beth Tzedec Congregation instead of Beth Tikvah.

As well, Rabbi Allen is provost of the new Canadian Yeshiva and Rabbinical School, a project that is expected to open in 2012, and he sits on its board.

"I'm very much involved in the planning… but I have other considerations as well. If I can balance all of them together, that would be great. I don't know yet how that will unfold."

He said that he's looking forward to the "opportunity to do something new and different, and contribute to the greater good of the Jewish people."

Exemplar of courage, herald of hope

With its signature dollop of severe sarcasm, the Drybones cartoon on the facing page laments the absence in the Muslim world of religious leaders willing to speak out against acts of extremism sanctioned in God's name.

He does not hide the fact that religious extremism exists in the Jewish world. On the contrary. He uses it as the backdrop to point to the open, public rejection and condemnation of the extremists by the mainstream religious establishment and the majority society whose values the rabbinic leaders purport to represent.

He may not be an imam, a leader or teacher of his religion per se, but Tarek Fatah is certainly a leader. The Karachi-born writer, commentator, broadcaster is also, quite simply, a man of great courage and hardy principle. His recently published book, The Jew Is Not My Enemy (McClelland & Stewart) is a gripping plea from the heart to his Muslim co-religionists to release themselves from the distorting, malevolent grip of the jihadists and to accept Israel as a sovereign Jewish nation among all nations. (A review of The Jew Is Not My Enemy by The CJN's Sheldon Kirshner appears elsewhere in this issue.)

"Questioning Israel's moral and legal right to exist as a state within secure borders that are recognized by its neighbours should cease to be a subject of endless debate," Fatah writes. He does not agree with all of Israel's policies, nor is he shy to say so. For example, he calls Israel's presence in the West Bank "illegal and immoral." But Fatah is a vocal champion within the Muslim world of the right of the Jewish people to have a sovereign state in the Middle East. As such, he is so very rare.

Fatah believes "it is fundamentally anti-Jewish to incessantly challenge the moral and ethical basis of Israel as a Jewish state." This clear, clarion articulation of principle places him squarely opposite the countless hordes for example at the UN-sponsored World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa in 2001 who incessantly denounced and vilified the Jewish state.

Last month, the members of the UN General Assembly voted overwhelmingly in favour of holding a 10th anniversary conference later this year celebrating that dark descent in Durban into pure Jew- and Israel-hatred. Canada along with 21 other countries opposed the holding of Durban III. Another 104 member states were in favour, while 33 abstained.

It is thus ever increasingly important to commend Fatah for his exemplary courage. He is a herald of hope for us that perhaps more and more Muslims will oppose their own extremists.

The Jewish people, of all people, know how important it is to hold on to hope. We have not, nor will we ever, lose hope.

25 years ago in The CJN

Attacks by Palestinian terrorists on El Al passenger facilities at the Rome and Vienna airports killed 19 civilians and wounded 138 more. Four of the seven attackers were also killed and the others were captured. The Abu Nidal Organization claimed responsibility. Israel's cabinet said Israel would retaliate at a time and place of its choosing.

Selling land, renting to non-Jews

Regarding a statement that was signed by some 39 Israeli rabbis, defending the chief rabbi of Safed, Shmuel Eliahu's public comment that Jews should not rent or sell property to non-Jews, I think that we can agree that, under normal circumstances as they exist in Canada, preventing someone from ownership of land or a home would be considered wrong ("These are not the values of Israel," Dec. 16). However, if those people, either collectively or individually, are planning a terror attack on your neighbourhood, then that general rule has some exceptions. In Israel, terrorism and murder against Jews is quite probable, and Jewish people are definite targets, thus the statement of the signatory rabbis is not in the category of radical fringe, nor is it made for discriminatory reasons – it was made to emphasize security and to prevent murder.

It is not for us sitting comfortably in Canada to tell Israelis what threats they must take seriously and which ones that they ought to ignore to make Diaspora Jews happy and feel that their co-religionists are just and fair.

Women play integral role in school

I thoroughly enjoyed reading the column "Doors need to be open to women" (Dec. 16). I totally agree with his advocacy for Jewish women taking on leadership roles in our Jewish day schools. I found it interesting that the printed version of the article stated that this was a co-educational Orthodox school "in Toronto," while the online version said "in our community."

If by coincidence, the article was referring to Hebrew Academy of Montreal's recent advertisement, please let me enlighten him and CJN readers. As the chair of the search committee for a high school vice-principal at Hebrew Academy of Montreal, I would like to mention that women play an integral role in our school's administrative positions. We presently have women who are acting as executive director, high school principal, elementary school vice-principal, director of student programming and admissions, school counsellor, special care counsellor, director of the preschool education, special needs co-ordinator and fundraising co-ordinator. The immediate past president of Hebrew Academy was a woman.

Our committee, along with our educational director, carefully and seriously set out the qualifications with the job description. Our school needs a male candidate in this specific instance to be a role model for our high school boys. The successful chosen candidate will be working as vice-principal directly under the supervision of our female principal. Presently, the girls in our school are extremely fortunate to have amazing women role models in leadership roles. I am proud to be an alumni, parent and supporter of the trail-blazing Hebrew Academy of Montreal.

CJC praised for monument work

I write both as a Holocaust survivor and as past chair of the Ottawa Holocaust Survivors Association. Thank you to the Canadian Jewish Congress and Hank Rosenbaum, formerly chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, for their plain talk regarding a Holocaust monument in Ottawa ("MP wants gov't to pay for Holocaust monument," Dec. 23). This is long overdue and I can tell you that CJC and Rosenbaum speak for many of us when they say that we are prepared to fundraise and work co-operatively with the government to finally bring this monument to life.

This issue also raises another important question. For years now, CJC has championed the rights of Holocaust survivors ("Congress wary of CIJA restructuring plan," Nov. 25). Many survivors only know it as Canadian Jewish Congress, and with community restructuring underway, I fear we will lose this strong voice. I join with many other Canadians, Jews and non-Jews alike, who have voiced similar concerns on this letters page, in urging our community leadership to keep Canadian Jewish Congress as our communal voice, with its dignity and legacy intact.

Berlin synagogue

In the article "Discoveries during a visit to Berlin," the the synagogue, the New Synagogue on Oranienburgstrasse, is misidentified (Chanukah supplement, Dec. 2). Also, I was surprised that the writer did not mention the huge memorial to the six million Jews in the city.

Battle lines are drawn after UN votes for Durban III

By MARCY OSTER
JTA

When the original UN "World conference against racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance," held in Durban, South Africa, in 2001, devolved into an anti-Israel hatefest, Jewish groups around the world were caught unawares.

So, when the Durban Review Conference was called for Geneva in 2009, Jewish activists started their fight early, convincing numerous countries to boycott the conference, dubbed Durban II, effectively blocking it from becoming a repeat of Durban I.

Now, with the recent UN vote to authorize Durban III – a UN General Assembly session planned for September 2011 to commemorate the original Durban conference – the battle lines again are being drawn.

"The vote of the UN General Assembly, while not unexpected, sets the stage for a celebration of the outrageous events that took place during Durban I, which were permeated by manifestations of bigotry and hatred," said a statement from the leaders of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

"The event is scheduled to be held shortly after the 10th anniversary commemoration of Sept. 11. It is hard to imagine a more insensitive action, recalling that the attack on the World Trade Center that killed thousands was carried out by those influenced by the same hateful ideologies that Durban I came to represent."

The first plans to boycott Durban III already are taking shape. Canada announced in November that it would boycott the September 2011 session on "Combating racism and follow-up of the Durban Program of Action."

"Canada will not participate in this charade," Immigration Minister Jason Kenney said at a Nov. 25 news conference. "Canada is clearly committed to the fight against racism, but the Durban process commemorates an agenda that actually promotes racism rather than combats it."

Both the United States and Israel have warned about Durban III turning into another occasion for gratuitous Israel-bashing.

When the matter came to a vote on Dec. 24, the vote was 104-22 in favour of the special General Assembly session; 33 countries abstained.

"We voted 'no' because the Durban Declaration process has included ugly displays of intolerance and anti-Semitism, and we do not want to see that commemorated," said a statement by the American ambassador to the United Nations, Susan E. Rice. "The United States is fully committed to upholding the human rights of all individuals and to combating racial discrimination, intolerance and bigotry. We stand ready to work with all partners to uphold human rights and fight racism around the world."

Israel's Foreign Ministry issued a statement announcing its intention to skip the session.

"Under the present circumstances, as long as the meeting is defined as part of the infamous 'Durban process,' Israel will not participate in the meeting," the statement said. "Israel expects the participants to deal appropriately with the serious manifestations of racism throughout the world, and to reject attempts to once again divert world attention from this dangerous phenomenon by means of cheap politicization."

Condemnation of the UN vote by Jewish groups was fast and furious.

"The original Durban conference attempted to validate the perverse theory that Zionism is racism," B'nai Brith International's executive vice-president, Daniel Mariaschin, said. "Durban's legacy of hate, intolerance and double standards should never be forgotten, and should certainly never be celebrated."

The Anti-Defamation League called for a boycott of Durban III.

David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, said the anti-racism agenda has been misappropriated. "The global campaign against racism has been hijacked by countries that have little regard for human rights and whose primary goal is to advance highly political agendas," Harris said. "To bring this travelling show of hatred to New York is scandalous and will not advance the noble UN mission of defending and protecting human rights."

At the original UN conference against racism in Durban, the United States and Israel walked out when it became clear that it had devolved into little more than an opportunity for vitriolic Israel-bashing that many said bordered on antisemitism. The conference's final document singled out Israel for special condemnation.

In Geneva in 2009, several European and North American countries announced ahead of time that they would not attend the conference out of concern that its special focus on Israel would make a mockery of the issue of fighting racism, and several more walked out of the conference when Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad used the occasion to bash Israel.

The countries that voted against the Durban III session were Australia, Bulgaria, Canada, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Germany, Israel, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, the Marshall Islands, Micronesia, the Netherlands, Palau, Poland, Romania, Slovakia, Sweden, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the United Kingdom and the United States. Among the countries abstaining were Austria, Belgium, France, Greece, Hungary and Spain.

Palestinians appeal for recognition of statehood

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian negotiators last month asked a number of individual European countries to recognize a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip – even without a peace deal with Israel.

The Palestinian Authority (PA) issued a similar appeal to the European Union earlier this week, but this was the first time it singled out specific countries with its request.

The appeal is part of a growing campaign to pursue statehood outside of peace talks with Israel, which have been deadlocked since September.

Palestinian officials said they asked the consuls general of France, Britain, Sweden and Denmark as well as the European Union (EU) envoy to the peace process to recognize the 1967 borders between Israel and Palestine.

In response to a letter from Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, the EU said it would recognize a Palestinian state when "appropriate," adding that negotiations are the only way to peace.

The PA's request was made just hours after the United States House of Representatives approved a resolution opposing unilateral declaration of Palestinian statehood.

That resolution, introduced by Howard Berman, chair of the House foreign affairs committee, slams Palestinian efforts to push the international community to recognize a state in such a manner, because "true and lasting peace between Israel and the Palestinians can only be achieved through direct negotiations between the parties."

It calls on the U.S. administration to "deny recognition to any unilaterally declared Palestinian state and veto any resolution by the United Nations Security Council to establish or recognize a Palestinian state outside of an agreement negotiated by the two parties."

It also urges Palestinian leaders to "cease all efforts at circumventing the negotiation process, including efforts to gain recognition of a Palestinian state from other nations, within the United Nations and in other international forums prior to achievement of a final agreement between Israel and the Palestinians... and calls upon foreign governments not to extend such recognition."

Earlier this month, Brazil announced, in response to a request made by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, that it recognized a Palestinian state based on borders at the time of Israel's 1967 conquest of the West Bank. Argentina and Uruguay followed soon after and said they intended to support a declaration of a Palestinian state.

Perhaps some good will come from disaster

Forty-four lives were lost in the massive wildfire that incinerated upwards of 4,000 hectares and hundreds of homes in and around the Carmel forests. Thirty-seven prison officials, mostly officer cadets, died on their way to help evacuate prisoners from Dammon Prison when their bus was engulfed by the inferno, along with the bus driver; three senior police officers, including Commander Ahuva Tomer, Haifa's police chief, who was following the bus in her patrol car, and three firefighters. One was Elad Riven, a 16-year-old high-school student and volunteer firefighter who left school upon hearing of the fire and died trying to save people on the bus.

This calamity is a microcosm of many things Israeli, good and bad.

That Israel's firefighting forces were not capable of extinguishing the blaze alone was a manifestation of a common Israeli mindset that, simply stated, says that "everything will be OK." Countless reports and recommendations about the appalling state of the country's firefighting services were ignored over the last couple of decades. Despite this writing on the wall, it was believed that when push came to shove, we would somehow manage.

When we couldn't, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his government reacted admirably, quickly enlisting foreign firefighting assistance, primarily airborne, aid that was surprisingly forthcoming. In a peculiar twist of fortunes, the most help quenching this Chanukah hellhole was sent by Greece. Relations with that country have been nurtured positively since last May's flotilla brouhaha and falling out with Turkey. But in a humanitarian gesture that may also help rebuild bridges, the Turks sent aid, too.

Yair Lootsteen

Demonstrating other Israeli phenomena, the mudslinging began well before the fire was extinguished – some of it warranted. And the rabbis got into the fray, led by Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, spiritual head of the haredi Shas party. He insinuated that the fire was a punishment from God because the affected area's residents hadn't satisfactorily abided the Sabbath. There was less clarity from Shas' Interior Minister, Eli Yishai, when it was reported that not long after assuming office, he had severed ties with the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, a pro-Israel Evangelical philanthropic organization that in the past supplied Israel with eight new fire trucks and had offered to provide funds for more.

There were also reasons for hope. As in previous times of crisis, Israelis banded together. Homes around the country were opened to those forced from theirs by the fire. Clothes were donated for victims. Meals were supplied. For once it didn't seem to matter whether you were Arab, Christian, Druze or Jewish.

The disaster also seems to have strengthened perceptions that some things are changing for the better.

We learned of two women, Ahuva Tomer (who was posthumously promoted to the rank of police brigadier-general) and her deputy, Etty Myerson, who held the two highest positions at the nation's largest single police station, in Haifa – no small feat, considering they served in the male-dominated bastion that is the Israeli police force – telling the tale of advances women are making in the Israeli workplace.

There's also been a heightened appreciation for our environment. While firefighters battled the fire to save people's lives and property, there was shared sadness about the millions of trees that went up in flames, destroying habitats for plants and animals in the Carmel mountains. The story that got particular attention was the effort to save the Hai-Bar Nature Reserve, a breeding and re-acclimation centre administered by the Israel Nature and Parks Authority, whose goal has been to re-introduce species of animals that have become extinct in Israel. The entire nation breathed a collective sigh of relief when the fire was put out before it could destroy this gem.

And Riven's tragic death reminded us that volunteerism is flourishing in Israel. He became a volunteer firefighter in a program called "personal involvement," requiring high-school students to give at least 60 hours to worthy causes. By doing such things as teaching elderly people to use computers, helping out in soup kitchens and tutoring underprivileged kids, teens learn to become responsible members of society.

Forty-four families will forever grieve this tragedy. But as the ashes settle and rain finally begins to fall, might we hope to grow from this catastrophe?

Freezing Palestinian myths

Palestinian myths of victimization have been the major obstacle to peace for more 60 years, but they're largely ignored by journalists, diplomats and would-be peace activists. Instead, the spotlight has been misplaced exclusively on Jewish settlements and the "occupation" that resulted from the 1967 war. The first two years of the Obama administration's peace efforts were entirely wasted because of the illusion that settlements are the cause of the conflict.

In order to break the long stalemate and end decades of failure, the myths of Arab victimization must be exposed – in place of a "settlement freeze," we need a "victimization freeze." False histories that blame Zionism (or European antisemitism) only serve to make peace based on mutual acceptance even more unlikely.

To move forward, Palestinians and their supporters need to be brought back to reality. In place of the myths, they will have to acknowledge that their "suffering" and the refugee problem were the result of the unanimous Arab rejection of the UN Resolution 181 – the November 1947 version of the two-state solution. This was followed by military invasions that killed one per cent of the Jewish population. The Arab defeat on the battlefield was followed by the entirely fictitious claim to a "right of return" as refugees from illegal wars for which the Arabs themselves were responsible.

This is difficult to capture in an emotional photo, dramatic headline, television documentary or YouTube video. Israeli settlements, scenes of the occupation and the inevitable images of Palestinian suffering are easy to portray and manipulate in order to evoke immediate and unquestioned sympathy with the perpetual victim. And while the number of Jews expelled from Arab countries in this period is roughly equal to the displaced Palestinians, the Jewish refugees were absorbed into the Israeli population.

Indeed, the Palestinian refugee industry is thriving, reinforcing the wall it has created to block any peace agreement based on a two-state framework that ends the conflict. UNRWA (the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East) provides hundreds of millions of dollars every year, and many officials are totally devoted to this anti-peace mythology, and to perpetuating the false refugee claims. When one UNRWA employee, Andrew Whitley, dared to question the myth, he was immediately attacked and forced by UNRWA's victimization police to recant his honest assessment. Expect him to be looking for alternative employment soon.

In addition, a vast network of non-governmental organizations using the language of human rights and humanitarian aid promote Palestinian refugee myths. Powerful groups such as BADIL ("The Resource Center for Palestinian Residency and Refugee Rights") get hundreds of thousands of dollars every year from a number of European governments to fuel the conflict in this way. For many years, allies in the International Development Research Centre funnelled Canadian taxpayer funds to BADIL.

Gerald Steinberg

In parallel, young Jews, many of whom have joined groups such as J-street and the misnamed "Jewish Voices for Peace," as well as some Israelis, have been exposed incessantly to these images and myths, and adopted the false narrative. Exploiting this situation, Palestinian officials such as Saeb Erekat – described by diplomats and journalists as a "moderate" because he looks and sounds reasonable – continue to weave false tales to sell to naive audiences.

Another myth, promoted during the failed Oslo peace negotiations, was that the Palestinian leadership was "holding the refugee card" in order to play it at the last minute. According to this script, former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat would suddenly reverse decades of Palestinian theology, and tell his people that the "right of return" was exchanged as part of a comprehensive peace. Like other parts of the Oslo process, this was based entirely on wishful thinking.

An alternative scenario that has survived Oslo and Arafat depicts the Palestinian leadership as knowing they're not going to return en masse and turn the Jewish state into another Muslim stronghold. All that they want, we are told, is a symbolic recognition of the "injustice" and their "suffering" resulting from the creation of the State of Israel. But this is simply another version of the victimization myth, which, if accepted, would be used to justify more terrorism and delegitimization of Israel.

Until these dimensions are addressed, peace efforts will be stillborn. In this framework, a freeze on refugee myths and false narratives is long overdue.

Peace is as elusive and distant as ever

Arthur Ruppin (1876-1943), a prominent Zionist official who headed the Jewish Agency from 1933 to 1935, was one of the founders of the Brit Shalom peace movement, which worked for Arab-Jewish coexistence and a binational state in Palestine. Ruppin's dovish views did not stand the test of time. Eventually, he famously declared, "What we can offer the [Palestinian] Arabs, they will not accept, and what they will accept, we cannot offer."

More than six decades on, Ruppin's crie de coeur rings eerily true. Despite herculean efforts by the United States to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict, Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) remain depressingly far apart on key core issues.

A two-state solution, the object of U.S. diplomacy and Israel's sole viable hope of maintaining its Jewish and democratic character in the face of a considerably higher Palestinian birth rate, rests on an accommodation with the Palestinians. Yet this scenario remains as elusive and distant as ever.

Before leaving office in 2009, Israel's then prime minister, Ehud Olmert, warned that Israel could not assure its future as a democratic Jewish state without peace. As he bluntly put it, "If the day comes when a two-state solution collapses, and we face a South African-style struggle for equal voting rights ... then, as soon as that happens, the State of Israel is finished."

With Olmert's prophecy partly in mind, the United States launched yet another peace process last September. To no one's surprise, the negotiations, looking more like an exercise in public relations than a substantive effort in peace-making, ground to a halt after Israel declined to extend a 10-month partial settlement freeze in the West Bank, which expired on Sept. 26.

Throwing up its hands in despair, the chastened Obama administration announced it had given up on efforts to persuade Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to lengthen the moratorium by three months, and would now instead concentrate on core issues.

The Obama administration, having rejected "the legitimacy" of Israel's settlement policy, made the announcement after Netanyahu turned down a package of extremely generous U.S. incentives in exchange for prolonging the freeze. Netanyahu had said he would present the U.S. offer to his cabinet only if it was received in writing. Washington, having concluded that a three-month moratorium would not produce sufficient progress on major issues, decided it was not worth the trouble giving Israel a written summary.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

It is debatable whether Netanyahu's cabinet, some of whose members prefer the status quo to conflict resolution, would have voted for Washington's military and political incentives, which critics likened to a bribe.

No less a person than Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak, acknowledged that the composition of Netanyahu's right-of-centre government renders peace with the Palestinians problematic. As Barak said: "There is a certain contradiction between the makeup of the government and the likelihood of delving further into peace negotiations." Carrying this logic to the next level, Barak, the embattled leader of the Labor party, implicitly suggested that the the centrist Kadima party, led by Tzipi Livni, the former foreign minister, should be invited to join the government.

Netanyahu – whose Likud party won less seats in the last election than Kadima, yet still managed to cobble together a government – has not seriously courted Livni. Their views, in some respects, clash. Livni holds that Israel should have prolonged the freeze and accepted the American incentives. And if Livni is to be believed, Netanyahu is simply too weak to take historic decisions, which could break up his coalition government.

In retrospect, Washington's decision to stop focusing on Israel's settlements and start concentrating on core issues was almost anti-climactic. The PA, having repeatedly warned it would spurn further negotiations unless Israel ceased all building activity in the West Bank, carried out its threat after three rounds.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas subsequently hardened his position, insisting on a moratorium in eastern Jerusalem, as well as in the West Bank. For Netanyahu, Abbas' demand was a non-starter, given his belief that all of Jerusalem belongs to Israel.

Observers, therefore, were less than surprised by Israel's announcement in October of its intention to build 238 housing units in eastern Jerusalem and by the Knesset's decision, one month later, to pass a bill that will require territorial concessions in eastern Jerusalem to be submitted to a referendum.

Although the PA protested, Abbas and Saeb Erekat, the Palestinians' chief negotiator, muddied the waters by asserting that the PA – which formally recognized Israel at the outset of the 1993 Oslo process – would never recognize Israel as a Jewish state.

A senior Palestinian official, Yasser Abed Rabbo, offered an olive branch: the PA would recognize Israel's Jewishness if Israel agreed to withdraw to the pre-1967 borders. Netanyahu's reaction was swift. He would not sign an accord with the Palestinians unless they revised their policy.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu greets PA President Mahmoud Abbas in Washington, D.C. last September. U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton looks on.

Judging by these testy exchanges, the atmosphere has worsened. But it was already bad. Netanyahu's national security advisor, Uzi Arad, ruffled Palestinian feathers by expressing doubts whether "we have a partner for a permanent agreeement," and exacerbated the situation by suggesting that Israel might be more interested in an interim rather than a comprehensive agreement.

The PA also took issue with a provocative speech Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman delivered to the United Nations. Citing an abysmal absence of trust between Israel and the Palestinians, he called for an intermediate agreement to be phased in over "a few decades," and argued that an agreement should be based on two principles: transferring some Israeli Arabs to the West Bank and abandoning the land-for-peace formula.

Netanyahu's office issued a bland statement distancing itself from Lieberman's comments, and the PA compounded the problem. In a throwback to the Yasser Arafat era, a PA deputy minister claimed that the Western Wall has no religious significance to Jews and is Muslim property. As well, the PA threatened to boycott new talks with the present Israeli government, threatened to dissolve itself so that Israel would be responsible for the West Bank, and threatened to request United Nations recognition of a unilateral declaration of Palestinian statehood.

Working on the assumption that Israel and the PA are committed to reaching an agreement, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton dispatched special Mideast envoy George Mitchell to the region in mid-December.

Mitchell plans to focus on core issues like borders and settlements. The PA has reportedly submitted its opening positions on such pivotal matters as security, Palestinian refugees and water. Since Netanyahu has apparently not set out all his views, Mitchell will probably schedule more talks with Israel's leadership than with the PA.

Netanyahu has informed Clinton that he is "serious" about continuing talks, but the PA seems skeptical, having concluded that he is more interested in process than in peace.

Clinton, meanwhile, has issued a warning about Israel's occupation of the West Bank. It is, she said, "endangering the Zionist vision of a Jewish and democratic state in the historic homeland of the Jewish people."

Going through hoops to unite kids

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

When Daniel Shane visits Israel in March, he'll be going for one specific reason: to play basketball.

In December, Daniel celebrated his bar mitzvah at Toronto's Temple Sinai. For his bar mitzvah project he wanted to do something out of the ordinary that included his love of basketball.

"I was trying to find an organization that combines my favourite thing to do, which is basketball, and create a difference in the world in some way," he said. "I did a bunch of research with my dad, and after a few weeks of searching, we found Peace Players International."

Peace Players International (PPI) was established in 2001. It operates in Northern Ireland, South Africa, Cyprus, New Orleans and the Middle East. Its goal is to use basketball as a way to unite and educate children and the communities they live in.

To date, Daniel has collected approximately $2,000 and 80 basketballs for the Middle East arm of the charity. Canada Basketball, the national organization for the game, is donating jerseys for PPI to give away as prizes.

In November, Daniel made a presentation on PPI to his Grade 8 class at Crescent School, discussing what he is trying to accomplish and the trip to Israel he and his family will be taking. They are trying to get kids from his class to join them on the trip, and a few have expressed interest, Daniel's father, Terry Shane, said.

Daniel Shane

In addition to his collecting money and basketballs for PPI, the organization put Daniel in touch with three kids in the program – two boys, one a Muslim Arab, the other a Muslim Christian, and one Jewish girl.

"I've been talking with them a lot lately," Daniel said.

"The cool thing is we've had the most response from... the Muslim [Arab] boy. It's interesting because [Daniel's] getting to see that not every Palestinian is a member of Hamas," Terry said.

"They're actually people at the other end of this who are kids who just want to play basketball. When you see the pictures of them on Facebook with their families, they're not so different."

Daniel is looking forward to playing basketball with the PPI teams and meeting his "twins," the three people he's been exchanging e-mails with. He's also really enjoyed seeing his dream of making a difference in the world come true, which was also the subject of his Torah portion.

"My Torah portion was about dreams, about how [Joseph's] original dream was to see all of his family bow down to him. My part that I read was when Joseph's brothers came and bowed down to him. So it's all about dreams coming true.

"The reason I was so interested in this organization from the beginning is because it showed me even a small dream can grow, and it can grow to become something huge and make a huge difference, even if you're just one or two people."

"It's really cool that he's taken his passion and that it's all come together like this," Terry said. "I think he's going to do big things when he gets older."

Daniel's next goal is to figure out how to send the basketballs and jerseys to Israel, as donations shipped there get taxed. They're hoping to find people travelling to Israel who are willing to take some of the items with them and avoid PPI having to pay the tax.

In the meantime, Daniel and his family plan to continue raising money and awareness until they go to Israel.

To see the presentation Daniel made to his school visit www.shanecentral.com/peaceproject. More information on Peace Players International can be found at www.peaceplayersintl.org.

Are Palestinians ready for a true two-state solution?

The Dec. 23 column criticized Noam Chomsky for something he said last month on TVO. Space did not allow, however, for the acknowledgment of a very rare, lucid (if not completely accurate) observation he made about what occurred during the peace talks between Israelis and Palestinians at Taba in January 2001.

Chomsky admitted that at Taba, under former U.S. president Bill Clinton's bridging proposals, the parties came "very close" to accepting a two-state solution. Although unsuccessful, the deal needed just a few more days to be concluded, Chomsky implied.

That was a shocking admission from the principal figure of the radical left who has long insisted that the United States and Israel have constantly conspired to undermine any chance of Palestinian statehood.

Chomsky was wrong about one essential fact: the parties were not in agreement. It was then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat who refused the offer. Clinton himself was clear about Arafat's failure to seize the historic moment. Several senior Palestinian and Arab officials also expressed bitter disappointment in the PLO chairman. Even Arafat himself, some 18 months later, claimed (according to Akiva Eldar in Ha'aretz) that he was finally prepared to accept Clinton's plan! But it was far too late by then – Arafat had initiated a campaign of terror on Israelis, so his concession was doubly hollow.

Writing in the Dec. 20 Jerusalem Report magazine on Arafat's legacy on the sixth anniversary of his death, Danny Rubinstein, a veteran Israeli observer of Palestinian and Arab affairs (and someone commended for his journalism by Chomsky in several of his books), noted:

"Arafat rejected Clinton's outline for the same reasons that his successor, Mahmoud Abbas, balked and refused to sign an agreement with [then-]prime minister Ehud Olmert two years ago. In both cases, the two Palestinian leaders feared that their public would not accept the concessions required of the Palestinian side.

"The Palestinian public's political views appear to be far more extreme than the positions taken by most of its leaders. On the question of the 'right of return of the 1948 refugees,' for example, most of the Palestinian leadership is prepared to compromise. But when the issue is raised, loud public opposition – 'Don't give up that right!' – can be heard on the streets of Nablus and Jenin, and throughout the refugee camps in Gaza, Lebanon and Jordan. Anyone in favour of compromise is immediately branded a traitor."

Other analysts who have come to the same general conclusion about what Arafat and Abbas have rejected argue that these leaders themselves were (and are) not willing to compromise on crucial issues: refugees (confining the "right of return" to a future Palestinian state) and Jerusalem (recognizing Jewish historical attachment to the Western Wall and Temple Mount).

Rubinstein is fluent in Arabic and spends time speaking with Palestinians directly. When he writes about the extremism of the Palestinian public on the matter of the "right of return," he should be listened to carefully.

We often read in western media that according to Palestinian public opinion polls, a majority favours a "two-state" solution. Rarely, if ever, does a western journalist follow up with the essential question: does this mean that the Palestinians are prepared to confine a "return" of refugees to their own state instead of to Israel (in which case they would end up with two Arab states)? The answer to that question is the crux of the matter. Successive Palestinian leaderships have not prepared their public to accept a genuine two-state arrangement, and the Israeli public knows this.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas

If there was a Palestinian leadership that followed in the footsteps of Anwar Sadat and King Hussein, who spoke directly to the Israeli public, assuring Israelis that peace means acceptance and an end to the conflict, a whole new dynamic in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process would ensue.

Instead, Abbas appears determined to avoid any of this. By skirting direct negotiations with Israel and appealing instead to the international community to accept a Palestinian state without the need for any compromises with Israel, he's only protracting the conflict.

Survivor reunites with man who saved her life

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

After 65 years, Holocaust survivor Sara Marmurek was reunited with Wladyslaw Misiuna, the man who risked his life to save hers.

The 88-year-old Marmurek, who lives in Toronto, reunited with her Polish saviour, who lives in Warsaw, at Kennedy Airport in New York.

Marmurek had no trouble recognizing Misiuna. She says that they cried with joy at their reunion.

"I never thought I'd be alive to see you again," the 85-year-old rescuer told Marmurek in Polish. She was standing unreadily on legs that had been mangled by Gestapo torturers.

"It was very emotional when the Jewish Foundation for the Righteous called me... about a reunion, Marmurek said.

"When they called me, my mind went back to my home in Poland and all the happenings."

The Foundation for the Righteous honours and supports 1,800 Christians and Muslims around the world who risked their lives to save Jews during the Holocaust.

Marmurek was born in Opatow. Her father, Jacob Stopnicki, was in the Judenrat – administrative bodies that the Germans required Jews to form in the German occupied territory of Poland during World War II. In 1942, her father heard that their town was to be liquidated, and he took his family to Sandomierz, as he believed it would not be liquidated for some time.

When the Germans came to Sandomierz, they made a selection. Marmurek was pregnant, and one of the policemen said to her, "You with the stomach, leave the line."

She recalls, "My mother was in her early 40s. She changed places with me and told me that she had her life already.

"You go," she told me. "Your life is just beginning." Marmurek never saw her mother again.

When she was going to have the baby, a German officer who knew her family took her to the hospital as a non-Jew. After she gave birth, she was recognized and had to leave the baby with her father when she returned to the Sandomierz camp. The baby died of starvation.

In 1943, when Marmurek was in Radom, she and four other Jewish women were assigned to work at a rabbit farm where Misiuna was a supervisor. The farm bred rabbits for food and clothing.

Misiuna helped her and other Jews with the work and gave them food and medicine. He also brought extra food to give to other Jews to keep them alive. She adds that he would talk to them and give them hope that they would survive.

At their reunion in New York, Marmurek asked Misiuna why he helped the Jews and risked his life.

"He said he was appalled by the way the Jews were being treated. He could not see people who were treated wrongly," she says.

Misiuna was arrested when Marmurek was at Auschwitz. The Gestapo tortured him when they discovered that he had been bringing food and supplies to the Jews in the ghetto.

Marmurek and her husband, Saul Marmurek, came to Canada in 1948. They came with their two-year-old son, Harvey, who is now head of the psychology department at the University of Guelph. In Canada, they had a daughter, Shirley (Moussa).

Saul died three years ago, after the couple was married for 65 years. Sara

Marmurek has four grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

She says that it took her a long time speak of her past. "I just started now to talk. It was painful, but now my children know and I'm not silent anymore. It gives me closure in my life."

Her son and daughter and their spouses accompanied Marmurek to New York for the emotional reunion as a guest of honour with Misiuna at a dinner at the Waldorf Hotel, given by the Jewish Foundation of the Righteous.

Misiuna, who is an author and professor at the University of Warsaw, is helping on the committee for the Holocaust Museum in Warsaw, which is to open in 2012.

"It is because of Misiuna that I had a wonderful life," Marmurek says. "I thank God that I had the opportunity to say thank you to him in person for what he did."

"Cochini" Jewish Women's Folksongs: Origins in Kerala (India) & Revival in Israel

Barbara Johnson, Cornell University

January 12, 2011, 6:30pm

5th Floor, York Research Tower, Rm 519

PART OF A SERIES OF TALKS ON JEWISH CULTURE AROUND THE WORLD

Brightly colored parrots carrying messages – Biblical narratives filled with midrash – elegantly adorned brides – beloved old synagogues – modern Zionist songs set to cinema tunes: these are some of the themes in a rich body of vernacular folksongs sung and preserved by Jewish women from South India. Their ancestors lived a secure and observant Jewish life for at least twelve centuries on the southwest Kerala coast of India before most of the community left in the 1950s for Israel, where they are now known as "Cochinim." Fearing the songs would be forgotten, scholars began collecting handwritten texts and audio recordings, but it took a group of retired Cochini women who had left India in their youth to launch a small performance revival of the songs in Israel. This multimedia presentation offers an overview of the songs, featuring photos, audio and video recordings of performances by the Nirit Singers.

BARBARA C. JOHNSON taught in the Anthropology Department and was Coordinator of Jewish Studies at Ithaca College before retiring in 2007. She continues her active research on the Kerala Jews as a Visiting Scholar at Cornell University. She was co-author with Ruby Daniel of Ruby of Cochin: An Indian Jewish Woman Remembers and edited the CD/book Oh Lovely Parrot!: Jewish Women's Songs from Kerala. During frequent visits to Israel she is affiliated with the Ben-Zvi Research Institute and the Jewish Music Research Center at Hebrew University.

Musical theatre group fundraises for Ve'ahavta

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Over the past four years, annual shows featuring Leo Baeck Day School parents and teachers raised a total of more than $100,000 for the school.

But this year, organizers felt it was time to take a break. "We didn't want it to get too stale," said Mike Levinsky, middle school co-ordinator for the school's north campus, and the shows' director and choreographer.

The shows had been drawing from a limited pool of performers and playing to the same audience, he said.

But Levinsky and musical director Robin Perlmutter – a former Leo Baeck parent, and the founder and managing director of the Toronto Youth Music Theatre Company – had second thoughts when they considered feedback from cast members who told them how much it had meant to them to be in the shows.

They decided to use the same model and raise money for a charity.

But first, they wanted to know if a committee of three parents who had played key roles behind the scenes would work with them again. "There's no way we could do what we do without the three of them," said Levinsky.

When he explained that this year's effort would be for a charity, they said they would come on board "for sure," he recalled.

Levinsky and Perlmutter formed a new production group called Play It Forward Productions.

One of the committee members, as well as Levinsky, had a two-degrees-of-separation connection with Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, and decided to look at the organization's website when they were searching for a charity to help.

"We were really impressed," Levinsky said.

This year's production, Aim Chai, is a Broadway musical revue with 18 songs from 18 musicals, including Annie, Wicked, West Side Story and Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat.

It will raise money for Ve'ahavta with shows at the City Playhouse in Vaughan at the end of January: a 2 p.m. matinée and a 7:30 evening performance on Jan. 30, and a final evening performance on Jan. 31. The evening show will also be an event of the Toronto Alpha Omega Dental Society.

Cast members are not professional actors, although some of them have had voice training. "They just love performing," Levinsky said.

Levinsky and Perlmutter accepted 40 cast members, and chose songs – both ensemble and solo pieces – that would fit their voices, Levinsky said.

"We work them very hard," said Perlmutter.

At the same time, Levinsky added, "We feel good about creating a tight-knit ensemble."

Laurie Walman, a mother of two who manages a psychology practice, said that even when she's having a bad day, she "can't wait" to get to rehearsal.

She joined the first cast with no singing background, after an audition she recalls as nerve-racking. "I called them and said I can't do this. They worked with me and said, 'We are going to make an actor out of you.'

"The support is incredible... In the end, it's like we become a family."

Although she sings only "a line or two," it's not about being the star. It's about being part of something that's for a good cause, and how much fun it is."

Harvey Cooperberg, a 60-year-old dentist, is the senior member of a cast that includes performers age 23 and up. He has performed in "lots of" amateur musical theatre including a 2006 Yorkminstrels production of Oliver!, but he hasn't performed with Play It Forward before.

"I've been blown away by the talent in this group," he said at a December rehearsal. "Rehearsals are just as much fun as the performance."

The lesson of the 10th plague

By RABBI ZUSHE SILBERSTEIN

This week's Torah portion, Bo, contains the account of the 10th and final plague that God visited on the Egyptians, the only one in which the Jews were required to put a mark of identification upon their homes so that they would not be afflicted when the Egyptian first-born sons were killed. The Jews were commanded to put blood from the Passover sacrifice on their doorposts, also symbolic of the blood of the covenant of circumcision, and warned to remain in their homes until the morning.

The midrash states the reason why these precautions were necessary: "Once the Destroyer is given free reign, it cannot distinguish between the righteous and the wicked." This is why a special sign was needed to divert the Angel of Death.

This begs the question: wasn't the Angel of Death allowed free reign during the previous nine plagues? Why weren't measures taken then by the Jewish people to protect themselves?

The slaying of the first-born was different from the other nine plagues that preceded it. The first nine plagues brought a limited and specific type of injury and devastation. The Angel of Death was not allowed to indiscriminately destroy in whatever manner it chose. During the 10th plague, however, the Egyptian first-born died in a multitude of different ways.

Even more fundamental is the fact that the aim of the first nine plagues was to make the Egyptians acknowledge the existence and power of God. The goal of the final plague was to punish the Egyptians for their immoral lifestyle and for the 210 years of brutal slavery that the Jews suffered under their rule.

At this point, the Heavenly Attribute of Justice complained before God and demanded that the Jewish first-born should not be spared: "How are the Jews so different from the Egyptians? Both nations have served idols, and both nations have sunk into the 49 gates of impurity!"

Rabbinic Reflections

In response to the seemingly valid arguments, God decreed that the Jews identify themselves with a special sign, so that no harm would befall them.

The blood with which they painted their doorposts was symbolic of the essential connection which exists between God and Am Yisrael, a bond that transcends all rationale and human understanding. The command to publicly defy Egyptian sensitivities by slaughtering a lamb, the Egyptian deity, seemed to be irrational, and required selfless sacrifice on behalf of Am Yisrael. It was precisely this disregard for the natural order and the willingness for self-sacrifice that brought about the redemption. Because when we go beyond the boundaries of logic to show our devotion to God, He repays in kind.

Chassidic philosophy explains that sparing the Jews from the 10th plague was a demonstration of God's overwhelming love for the Jewish people. The kind of love which is irrespective of the son's negative behavior, it transcends even the legitimate claims of the Attribute of Justice. But for this Godly love to manifest itself, we need to express our infinite commitment to Him.

Today, we find ourselves in a similar situation to the one our ancestors faced as they were about to leave Egypt. The Final Redemption is right at our door, and all that is required is that we transcend the bonds of rational deliberation and declare ourselves ready.

In this merit may we see the revelation of Mashiach and the dawn of the messianic era.

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein is spiritual leader of Chabad Chabanel Maison Belfield in Montreal.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Overcoming adversity

When a British Columbia farmer was asked how he harvested such large crops of apples, he pointed to a cluster of trees on whose lower trunks grooves had been deeply cut. He explained: "The secret lies in those grooves. After several failures, I discovered that when trees sprout heavy foliage but scanty fruits, their yield is increased when I gash them... when I hurt them, as it were." The lesson is clear: it is possible to convert a minus into a plus, to transmute wounds into fruitage – but often at a cost of some hurt or pain.

Bernard Baskin

In Shakespeare's As You Like It, an exiled noble exclaims: "Sweet are the uses of adversity, which like the toad, ugly and venomous, yet wears a precious jewel in his head."

A pattern of adversity appears frequently in biblical literature. All the prophets experienced it. Jeremiah was hounded from pillar to post. Ezekiel was carried into captivity. Hosea was betrayed by an adulterous wife. Job grovelled in a dung heap, bereft of children, stripped of affluence and taunted by his friends. Yet, perhaps just because of their struggles, they succeeded to the extent that we read their stories and are nurtured by their words and quickened by their wisdom. They rose above despair to become creative and enduring voices of mankind.

English poet and critic William Earnest Henley contracted tuberculosis as a child and had his left foot amputated. He wrote: "It matters not how strait the gate, how charged with punishment the scroll, I am the master of my fate, I am the captain of my soul."

Renoir broke his arm in early life and had to learn how to paint with his left hand. Later, he suffered so intensely from arthritis that his brush had to be strapped between his thumb and index finger.

Helen Keller, who was deaf and dumb, wrote, "I thank God for my handicap, for through them I have found myself, my work and my God."

Despite a progressive paralysis that deprived him of speech and movement, Jewish philosopher Franz Rozensweig continued his literary work, pointing with a single finger to the keys on the typewriter.

At the first performance of his Ninth Symphony, a hopelessly deaf Beethoven couldn't hear the applause and had to be turned around to face the audience.

Of course, not just these famous personalities but a multitude less well known – relatives, friends and ordinary members of our community – learn how to transform their handicaps and their defeats into a sturdy shield against life's storms.

A lad once asked an old sailor, "What is the wind?" The seaman replied, "I can't tell you what the wind is, but I know how to hoist the sail when it blows."

Yes, the wind is real, life's hurts are real, our disappointments and frustrations are real. One cannot find asylum from these events by resorting to flight. But each of us can hoist a sail and discover that even times of pain and travail can be enriching experiences.

Carmel fire ignites prejudices

The wildfire that swept across the Carmel Mountains near Haifa last month is one of the worst natural disasters to hit Israel in recent memory. At the end of it, 44 Israelis had lost their lives, 17,000 people – Jews, Arabs, and Druze – had to be evacuated, about 250 homes were severely damaged and, according to Jewish National Fund estimates, more than five million trees were destroyed.

For a while, there were fears the devastation would spread even further than it did, and the obvious priority was to staunch the flames by whatever means. It's precisely this sort of impending tragedy that brings people together toward a common cause. It's a time when old baggage is set aside, however temporarily, and humanity shines through with generosity and resolve.

And while it was undoubtedly seen by some as an embarrassment that Israel should in such circumstances require assistance from the international community, it was nonetheless uplifting to see how quickly and unrestrainedly such aid was forthcoming, some of it from the most unlikely of places. Even amid the recent acrimony of the Israeli-Turkish relationship, Turkey sent its firefighters, and, despite the barely viable "peace" with Egypt and Jordan, the governments of both these countries rushed in truckloads of equipment to help put out the blaze. Also sent to help were three fire engines from the Palestinian Authority.

But just as fighting the inferno gave us a glimpse of how co-operation and goodwill can transcend political barriers in times of need, we saw, as well, the flip side of such altruism: the sordid schadenfreude – pleasure derived from the misfortune of others – that punctuated much of the Arab world's reaction to Israel's predicament.

My View

By Lawrence Hart

Most respondents to websites such as those hosted by Al Jazeera and Al-Arabiya expressed delight at the destruction that the fires were causing, with some going so far as hoping that this might be just a prelude to a "newer, greater Jewish holocaust". A dominant thread in many of these outbursts was the notion that this was God's way of punishing Israel for "occupying" Arab lands and killing Palestinians. Ismail Haniyeh, head of Hamas in Gaza, described the fires as "divine strikes from Allah for what they [Israel] did" – presumably a reference to the Israel Defence Forces' military actions during the Gaza war of 2008.

Ironically, it was not only from the Arab side that the blaze was viewed as divine intervention. Sadly, such attributions were made by the leadership of some Jewish haredi sects in Israel as well. Writing in London's Daily Telegraph, columnist Adrian Blomfield noted that "[Rabbi] Ovadia Yosef, spiritual leader of Shas, a powerful religious party in Israel's coalition government, said there was little doubt that the fire was sent by God to punish his chosen people for their waywardness." According to Rabbi Yosef "fire exists only where the Sabbath is desecrated." "We must repent," he insisted, and "keep Shabbat appropriately."

For those who lost loved ones in the fire and for those now needing to rebuild their homes and their lives in its aftermath, such prejudice, from whatever source, but more particularly from segments of Israel's own religious leadership, is especially cruel, and especially deplorable.

Solving Israel's water crisis, Pt. 1

Drought in Israel. Low water levels. Record rains! Problem solved?

Not so fast. As journalist Zafrir Rinat makes clear, "the disappearance of the basic problem is, of course, illusionary: the danger of water shortage still lurks." [http://bit.ly/isrwat8] Today, some possible solutions.

Conservation: In 2000, Israelis used only 338 cubic metres of water per year per person (compared to 1,494 cubic metres by Canadians.) [http://bit.ly/isrwat14] But that wasn't good enough considering the country's limited resources. Israel's conservation program wants to cut that number further in the agricultural, manufacturing and domestic sectors. [http://bit.ly/isrwat15]

Taxation: So last year, the Knesset approved a Drought Tax, a residential levy on excessive water. [http://bit.ly/isrwat16] Although the tax has been suspended, National Infrastructure Minster Uzi Landau said it was a success because it raised awareness about conservation, and water consumption decreased by 15 per cent over the previous summer. [http://bit.ly/isrwat17]

Desalination: "Nuclear desalination plant will be ready by 1971" read the December 1965 headline of the Jerusalem Post. "President Lyndon Johnson has assured Prime Minister Levi Eshkol of U.S. willingness to help finance the joint U.S.-Israel nuclear desalination plant." [http://bit.ly/isrwat18] Nuclear desalination never saw the light of day, but Israel has made huge strides in the creation of potable water. As the Post recently noted, "the situation would be considerably worse now if three desalination plants – in Hadera, Ashkelon and Palmahim – weren't already producing 300 million cubic metres of fresh water a year." When Ashdod's opens in 2012 and Sorek's in 2013, output will double and approach the volume of the country's residential water use. [http://bit.ly/isrwat19]

Jewish & Digital

By Mark Mietkiewicz

Recycled wastewater: Desalination can be prohibitively expensive for agricultural use. Since many crops can lower-quality tolerate water, treated wastewater is a source of water for irrigation. Israel recycles nearly 70 per cent of its sewage water for agriculture. [http://bit.ly/isrwat20]

Importing water: In 2004, Turkey agreed to a 20-year proposal to ship water to meet three per cent of Israel's needs. That deal was scrapped in April 2006. [http://bit.ly/isrwat27] Following this year's Gaza flotilla raid, Turkey said that there will be no new energy or water projects with Israel until relations between the two countries improve. [http://bit.ly/isrwat24]

Modifying crops: Kibbutz Tzuba in the Judean Hills has a history of farming fruit trees, but the kibbutz has decided to become an estate winery. Apples need 3,000 cubic metres of water per acre per year. But grapes need only 800, making them more suitable to a country experiencing a long-term water shortage. [http://bit.ly/isrwat25]

New technologies: Tal-Ya Water Technologies has developed a method to squeeze dew from the air for watering crops. The plant sits on a plastic tray that funnels dew to the plant's roots. Reclaimed dew can reduce the need to water crops by up to 50 per cent. Jewish liturgy has long valued the importance of dew. Science is finally catching up. [http://bit.ly/isrwat26]

Terraces of Baycrest resident spearheads Schalit petition

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Yaakov Gladstone, 86, has only lived at the Terraces of Baycrest for six months, but in that short time, he has changed many residents' lives for the better.

Originally from Montreal, and a longtime resident of New York, N.Y., his family suggested he move here after his health began deteriorating.

"When I came, I found so many people just sitting around. I wanted to ignite them. Growing up, I was a youth leader for Habonim, and I still think like a leader. I didn't change because I am in assisted living," he said.

The first thing he did was start a Yiddish discussion group. "Some people spoke in English because they're Yiddish isn't strong, but everyone talked about themselves. I told them that each one had something to contribute."

Through the discussion, he said, he discovered that some group members had been involved in creative arts, and others had sung in choirs. "These people were energizing me, and I decided we needed more than a discussion group. That's when a gathered 15 people and started the Terraces Chorus."

They began practising and planned their first performance for Chanukah, he said. "We invited a group from Hashomer Hatzair, [a Socialist Zionist youth movement.] They came dressed in white and blue, and took part in the concert. We were accompanied by pianist Elizabeth Mitchnik, and candles were lit by Bernard Rubin. We encouraged the audience to clap, and sing along.

Israelis call for release of Gilad Schalit. Now residents from Terraces of Baycrest are signing a petition calling for his release.

"A very meaningful part of the evening was the signing of a petition to free Gilad Schalit. I asked people to sign, and I distributed it after the concert as well. It's essential that people stay involved in life. You don't have to be dormant just because you're in a wheelchair."

His proudest moment, he said, was when one of the chorus members who initially resisted joining, told him he ignited a spark in her. "We often have people perform for us here, but now we are performing for ourselves."

He is planning another concert for Passover, he said, and encourages people to get involved. "You don't have to be singer. You just have to want to sing."

נאום המלך

מעבר למשחק מושלם ויחסים אישיים כנים ונוגעים ללב- הסרט מכסה תקופה הסטורית חשובה בצורה מרתקת.
זהו סרט חובה למי שרוצה להנות , עשר בסולם קורן.

העבודה אושרה בשנה שעברה והסטודנטית זכתה בדרגת מוסמך של אוניברסיטת טורונטו. לו היה כותב את העבודה הזו סטודנט מוסלמי או נוצרי- היתה מתלקחת מלחמת עולם- אבל הנערה הזו היא יהודיה, שייכת לקבוצה שטוענת שישראל היא מדינת אפארטהייד והבחורה עצמה היתה בין אלה שפלשו לקונסוליה הישראלית לפני מספר שנים.

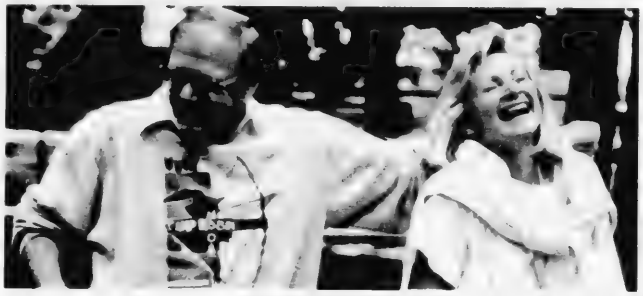
איש זקן סבל מבעיות שמיעה רציניות, עד אשר סופסוף סידרו לו מכשיר שמיעה משוכלל שקולט מאה אחוז ממה שנאמר. כשהוא חוזר לבקורת לרופא, אומר לו הדוקטור: שמיעתך מצויינת! המשפחה שלך בטח מאוד שמחה שאתה יכול לשמוע שוב!"
ענה לו האיש:
"לא, לא אמרתי להם עדיין.... אני רק יושב ומקשיב. שיניתי את הצוואה שלי כבר שלוש פעמים....."
שני גימלאים יושבים במבוא למוסד הגימלאים והאחד אומר לשני: "אני יודע שאתה בן גילי, והינה אני מלי טאבים ואי נוחות. איך אתה מרגיש?"
עונה לו השני: "אני מרגיש כמו תינוק!". "וואו, איך זה יכול להיות שאתה מרגיש טוב כמו תינוק!".
"מאוד פשוט- עונה לו חברו- בלי שיער, בלי שיניים, וממש ברגע זה הרטבתי במכנסיים".



Larry and Pearl Bell

Bells celebrate 50 years at Camp Robin Hood

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

When Larry and Pearl Bell go back to camp next summer, it will be for the 50th time.

In 1961, Larry and Pearl responded to an ad from Camp Robin Hood. Larry was hired as swim director and Pearl as a nurse. The two knew each other before working at Robin Hood – they both went to Forest Hill Collegiate – but weren't in the same circle of friends.

"I was this nerdy girl from Sarnia with culture shock going... to Forest Hill high school. I used to play tennis at lunch," Pearl said.

"He was a hotshot at school – the prefect, swimmer. I knew he existed in high school, but we weren't in the same circles. When I got accepted to nursing [for university] and I was in residence, coincidentally [Larry's] cousin was in residence with me," she added.

One day Larry, who was studying at University of Toronto at the time, was driving his cousin home for the weekend and gave Pearl a ride home at the same time. That was really the start of their relationship, she said.

"We knew right away that it was going to work for us, we had similar interests."

The couple has been married for 46 years and has two daughters, Sari and Michelle.

Larry and Pearl were involved with the camp over the years, and then they turned the operation of the camp over to Sari and her husband, Howie Grossinger, a few years ago. They are now the camp's owners and directors. Larry and Pearl are both still involved in the camp, however, as senior directors focusing on the administration and health aspects of the camp.

In honour of Larry and Pearl's 50 years at Camp Robin Hood, a tribute dinner is being held on Feb. 24, 2011, with the proceeds going to Kids in Camp. Kids in Camp is a charity that sends kids to Ontario Camps Association accredited camps.

"I'm so happy that we're in good health and able to enjoy this among [our] family and friends, all the generations of campers and staff," Pearl said.

"It's the kind of business that we're in where it's a happy relationship between people. We're doing the kinds of things that we love. Every day is a new adventure."

In their 50 years at the camp, it has gone through some major changes.

"The changes I've seen over the years... have been tremendous. We're a far more litigious society, communication has to be instant," Pearl said.

"The way our health centres are set up now, we're able to use computer systems for records. We have far more kids coming to camp today with medications. I find times have changed, and it's a bit of a different ball game in terms of the wellness of kids coming to camp."

Larry added: "However, the nice part is no matter what the changes are, [Camp Robin Hood has] always been a great place for kids to form friendships, to grow, to feel good about themselves, to experiment with different aspects and develop new skills."

The camp has also been a breeding ground for many successful relationships and marriages.

"[You're] dealing with like people with the same kinds of interests," Larry said.

"Camp... has so many values that are attached to it in terms of their future and the things they learn from camping that they can use in every profession... All of those good things they're looking for are connected with social interaction and nice people they're with.

"The most interesting thing is the quality of the staff we've had over the years. They've been remarkable, and many of our staff who were with us at the beginning are still our good friends. It's those relationships with those people that have been very special."

They are both looking forward to the tribute dinner.

"I'm humbled by it, very honoured and hope I can remember most of these people," Pearl said, laughing. "It's quite a tribute.

"We're very happy that they're making this a happy event and connecting it with a charity that's going to help children come to camp," Larry said.

Jewish fraternity holds largest fundraiser

By JOSH ROSEN
Special to The CJN

The Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) last year held the largest fundraising project in the group's 25-year Canadian history.

Participating in the UJA Walk With Israel over the summer, they raised more than $12,400 and engaged hundreds of fraternity brothers and university students from 10 campuses across Ontario and Quebec.

The initiative, which consisted of a national fundraising campaign and the first-ever after-party co-sponsored by AEPi and UJA Walk With Israel, marked the first major collaboration between the fraternity and United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto.

The goal of the partnership was to re-engage those who advocate for Israel on university campuses, but had become under-represented at the UJA's flagship event.

The event connected more than 500 students, parents, alumni, friends of the fraternity and the Jewish sorority Delta Pi through the fundraising campaign, the Walk itself and the party.

Though the Walk campaign officially ended in June, the AEPi Canada delegation was recognized at the organization's 97th anniversary international convention in New Orleans, winning the Philip H. and Susan Cohen Jewish Communal Service Award.

The Canadian group has won this award – selected from more than 140 chapters – two years in a row, as well as numerous Jewish communal service accolades presented to individual chapters.

The national campaign highlights the organization's commitment to philanthropy. In Kingston, the recently chartered group led by David Warshafsky "plays a large role in the Kingston Jewish community… We have held Shabbat dinners for local students, as well as philanthropy events where our brothers join together to raise money for UJA and many other charities, such as Chai Lifeline," Warshafsky said.

More recently, the fraternity has launched a Toronto-area alumni club, led by McMaster University alumnus Noam Berlin and a team of graduate brothers living in Toronto. With more than 1,000 alumni in the Toronto area, the Alumni Club provides an opportunity for brothers to reconnect and interact at several levels.

Berlin has a clear vision for the club. "Our goal for the Toronto alumni club is to provide an avenue where brothers can engage in social and business networking opportunities, philanthropic events and help the local undergraduate chapters," he said. Club events regularly draw more than 50 alumni to meet and greet events and include plans for the near future.

The opening event for the club attracted more than 60 alumni and was highlighted by a cheque ceremony celebrating the successful conclusion to the Walk With Israel campaign.

The fraternity continues to develop a distinct personality in the Canadian Jewish community. Brothers from the York University and University of Toronto chapters participated in the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto telethon, helping raise money for the 2011 campaign.

Many chapters hold regular events to raise funds for local charities and AEPi's official philanthropies, and volunteer with local organizations as well.

In November, AEPi Canada – represented by Canadian regional governor Darryl Firsten, alumnus Jesse Cohen and undergraduate Alec Levin – attended its first meeting as a member of the UJA's group council, continuing what has been a groundbreaking six months for AEPi.

Rabbis at home in the Canadian Forces

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Of the various slogans the Canadian Forces have used to attract new recruits, one seems most apt for Canada's two Jewish military chaplains: there's no life like it.

Each day, Rabbi Lazer Danzinger of Toronto and Ottawa-based Rabbi Karen Soria cater to the spiritual and emotional needs of Canada's men and women in uniform.

Philosophically, the two are poles apart: Rabbi Danzinger is a Chabadnik and Rabbi Soria is from the Reform tradition. But they agree that they have encountered some of their most interesting and satisfying work serving in the Forces.

In fact, Rabbi Danzinger, 54, has loved the experience so much that last summer he switched from the reserves and joined the regular forces for a six-year hitch.

Posted to Canadian Forces Base (CFB) Borden outside Barrie, Rabbi Danzinger is the Forces' first full-time Jewish chaplain since World War II.

"Things are fantastic, so much so that I decided to transfer," he told The CJN. "I've been very warmly received."

(In 2007, Rabbi Chaim Mendelsohn of Ottawa became the Forces' first Jewish chaplain since the end of World War II. A reservist captain, he was attached to 28 Field Ambulance in Ottawa. However, the Forces say Rabbi Mendelsohn has been "released" from duty and did not elaborate.)

To re-qualify for the regular force, Rabbi Danzinger, also a captain, underwent a rigorous seven-week course in drills, marching, fieldcraft and use of a gas mask – but no firearms training.

The Geneva Conventions, he points out, define chaplains as non-combatants and prohibit them from carrying or firing a weapon. "But we are trained in how to put a gun on safety."

Born and raised in Toronto, Rabbi Danzinger attended Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto before graduating from Ner Israel Yeshiva.

After 20 years in the computer business and service as a hospital and prison chaplain, he joined the Forces in 2008 originally attached to Army Reserves' 25 (Toronto) Service Battalion.

"As a child of Holocaust survivors, I am especially appreciative of the rights and freedoms that Canada gives its citizens," he said of his decision to join up. "To be able to live as a Jew freely without fear is something to be grateful for. So in gratitude, I want to give something back to this great country."

At CFB Borden, he's one of eight chaplains, including an imam. "I get along very well with him," Rabbi Danzinger says. He's assigned to base technical services, with about 1,000 personnel.

He's encountered "not very many" Jews. "There are a few." (The Forces do not reveal members' religions).

The two rabbis are tasked with ministering to the spiritual needs of all Forces members, regardless of faith, including facilitating worship. But sometimes, Rabbi Danzinger is pleasantly surprised when a Forces member reveals he or she is Jewish. "They say, 'I'm so happy to see you here.' It makes them proud."

The father of seven, two of them married, drives home to Toronto every Shabbat. There is no minyan on the base.

He would welcome a foreign posting, even to a war zone. "It would be a complete privilege to be deployed."

Rabbi Danzinger pointed out that while Christian chaplains have access to supplies such as vestments, Bibles and the like, Jewish ones scramble for kippot and prayer books. But the Forces are slowly rectifying that. "They're playing a little catch-up," he said, "but they're doing it."

Rabbi Soria, a captain in her late 50s, also tallies some firsts. She's the first female Jewish chaplain in the Canadian Forces; she was Australia's first female rabbi, and she was the first female rabbi to serve with the United States Marines during a four-year tour in Okinawa. She spent 11 years as a U.S. Navy chaplain.

Rabbi Lazer Danzinger and Rabbi Karen Soria
(Photos courtesy Canadian Forces)

Chicago-born, she came to Canada in 2003 and joined the Reserves last year, assigned to 3 Canadian Forces Flying Training School in Portage La Prairie, Man. Last summer, she transferred to 33 Combat Engineer Regiment in Ottawa.

Comparing Canada to the United States, "I really do find a better fit with the Canadian Forces, and the reason is a philosophical one and a sense of the mission," she told The CJN. "The Canadian Forces, in my experience, really sees itself as a peacekeeping [force], and that can include peace-making. The U.S. forces, in my experience, see themselves much more as war-fighting."

She addressed that theme more pointedly a few years ago in an interview with Jewish Woman magazine: "I don't believe either the military or the [U.S.] leadership has focused on the differences between making war and building peace. That's come into sharp focus in Iraq." She parted company with the U.S. military because of its "lack of treatment of human beings with dignity and respect no matter what their background, role and personal lives."

Typical duties for both chaplains involve not only spiritual matters but counselling, whether over strained marriages, relationship or money issues, substance abuse or just the stress of armed service. Sometimes, it's just lending a sympathetic ear, or as Rabbi Soria says, about "life stuff."

Neither has encountered antisemitism in the Forces.

"When you put on a uniform, people know you're part of a family," said Rabbi Danzinger. "That's a great ice-breaker."

Said Rabbi Soria: "Being a rabbi is a non-issue. I have been welcomed with enthusiasm and interest."

And it's a part-time job: she "parades with" her unit one evening a week (meaning the unit meets and trains at that time; sometimes there is an actual parade) and goes in another evening a week for administrative work and to talk with other officers. She's one of 27 female chaplains in the Forces.

Since 2008, the mother of four has been the spiritual leader of Temple Shalom in Winnipeg, where she travels every three or four weeks. As well, she teaches at Temple Israel in Ottawa and at Ottawa Modern Jewish School.

One sure sign of the acceptance, indeed of the success, of Jews in the Canadian Forces is seen in the small things.

Rabbi Danzinger boasts that the Forces chaplain general has welcomed the rabbi's proposal for a kippah that conforms to CADPAT (CAnadian Disruptive PATtern) standards.

In other words, a camouflage kippah.

"It would be a tremendous morale boost," he says.

Food that conforms to religious practice allowed

CPEs receive about 80 per cent of their revenue from the province, which spends more than $2 billion a year on daycare services.

The directive lists the "repeated" reciting of prayer, reading of sacred texts, memorizing religious chants and performing religious acts as examples of prohibited activities.

Any activity – even art projects – will be disallowed if the objective is to have children learn a particular religion.

Serving food that conforms to a religious practice will be permitted.

Children and staff members, as individuals, may display religious symbols or practise a religion while at the daycare. The directive suggests prayer rooms, if necessary.

The government is encouraging daycares to expose children to various religions or cultures in a general way.

"There is a difference between teaching religion and stressing a cultural tradition," James stated.

Atlas said the Jewish community believes it will be difficult for bureaucrats to make that distinction. It's also concerned about children being placed in situations "divorced from their family, social and cultural reality."

Rosenberg, who works in one of the Y's four CPEs, was among three Jewish representatives who sat on a consultative committee set up by the ministry. They left early on in the process because they felt the government had already decided on the direction it was going and was not very interested in their input.

Last March, the government announced its intention to take religion out of subsidized daycares. The National Assembly unanimously passed a motion supporting the move.

The issue of religious teaching was initially raised by the Parti Québécois (PQ). But the PQ critic for the family, Carole Poirier, says the new directive does not go far enough.

She believes the government should not allow any daycare receiving public money to be able to "discriminate" in its admission of children on the basis of religion or ethnicity.

The ministry's website lists more than 30 CPEs that are identifiable with the Jewish community.

Winnipeg teen wins silver medal in Polish dance competition

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sara Thompson, a Grade 10 student at Gray Academy of Jewish Education, won a silver medal at the IDO (International Dance Organization) world championship of ballet and jazz and modern dance held in Poland recently.

Sara won the medal in the juniors, solo female, "jazz-dance" category for her lyrical piece Dear Diary, which is about the damaging effect of teenage bullying. American Lindsey Norton was the winner of the gold medal in this category.

Dancers from 15 countries around the world competed at the Dec. 8 to 12 world championship.

Sara told The CJN that after dancing in the preliminary round of the competition, she "was hopeful of making the top 20." In the final round, she was the only Canadian among the top eight finalists from the United States, Slovenia, Norway, Poland, Germany and Italy.

"When they called my name for the silver medal, second only to the United States, it was like being in a dream. I never expected I would accomplish this," Sara said.

"It meant so much to me to perform this solo on the world stage because bullying transcends race and language, it happens to everyone. All kids all over the world should know that bullying can happen to anyone and they should never feel alone…

"This experience has been extremely positive for me. I have made lifelong friendships and learned that hard work, determination and sacrifice pay off in the end when you are going after a goal," she said.

Sara's mother, Val Thompson, said that "you could hear a pin drop in the auditorium [when Sara danced]. Even though Sara's words were in English and we were in Poland, her body movements and facial expressions painted an emotional picture of a young teen enduring the pain of bullying. Her message was universal."

Sara Thompson

Sara, who has been a student at the Shelley Shearer School of Dance since she was two years old, composed words about the painful effects of teenage bullying, and a recording of the script is played while she dances. Sara's dance trainer at the school, Lindsay Nelko, conceptualized and choreographed the dance that was performed.

Sara said it was important for her to confront the problem of teenage bullying through the medium of dance: "I wanted to do something meaningful that would let kids know that bullying can happen to anyone and they shouldn't feel alone. Most of all, they should never be afraid to speak out and tell someone."

Nelko said: " The effect of the solo is that of peering into the soul and mind of a girl who has been bullied. The dance enabled us to highlight the emotional impact, and we could see it resonating with everyone in the audience."

Thompson was one of four Canadian juniors jazz soloists to represent Canada in Poland, and she was also a member of the Canadian national adult dance team.

The team won the gold medal in the "ballet," large-group category; placed second in the "jazz-dance" small-group category and received the bronze medal in the "jazz-dance" large-group category.

Italian consulate honours Holocaust survivor

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A talk at the 30th annual Holocaust Education Week, held this past November, affected Gianni Bardini, the consul general of Italy in Toronto, so profoundly, that he has invited the speaker to talk to the Italian community.

After hearing the testimony of Miriam Frankel, whose family was expelled from Fascist Italy because they weren't native-born Italians, he decided he'd like to honour her.

"The story of the Holocaust in Italy is not well known. I want her talk to be a stepping stone for a number of events in which we can learn more about it," Bardini said in a telephone interview.

He'd also like to have Susan Zuccotti, an American historian who wrote about the Holocaust in Italy, come to speak during the year, he said, and he plans on screening movies and documentaries. "I'd also like to plan a conference about the Jews in Rome and Venice before and after the Holocaust."

The upcoming event, which is by invitation only and will include a tribute dinner to Frankel, is planned for the end of January, in conjunction with International Holocaust Remembrance Day on Jan. 27.

In the fall, he said, Bardini is planning a large event to celebrate the friendship of the two communities.

"This strong bond dates back many decades. The Italians and the Jews have a similar experience of adjustment and success in Toronto."

He said he's amazed by the array of services available to the Jewish community. "You are an inspiration to the Italians. We are a community in transition. Our needs are different now than they were in the first wave of immigration."

There are at least 300 Italian organizations based in the Greater Toronto Area, he said, "but they were created in the '60s and '70s by the first generation and were meant to be a source of comfort and support.

"This concept is a little outdated. We need a different community structure with an emphasis on bridging the Italians with the [greater] Canadian community. The Jews here act as a bridge between Canada and Israel, and are able to keep alive the language and culture. What you are doing is what we should do more."

Frankel, in a phone call from her winter home in Florida, said that growing up in Italy – her parents were born in Czechoslovakia – her father ran a kosher guest house. "Many Jews who escaped from Austria or Germany found their way to us in desperation. My father postponed our departure several times to help these people. He helped many of them get to South America.

"This delay on his part, however, sealed our fate. We were escorted by the Italian police onto a train headed for Czechoslovakia... Eventually, we were all taken to a ghetto and then deported to Auschwitz. I am the only survivor of the entire family."

She said that the Italian police were apologetic and embarrassed as they were leading the family away. Frankel said that after she spoke at the Holocaust Education Week event, Bardini stood up "and apologized with such feeling, even though it wasn't his fault. He said he felt deeply disturbed about what his country did to innocent people.

"I was very touched by such a gesture. I was totally and completely moved when he asked me to attend the commemoration of the International Day of the Holocaust."

Transplant patient dies in Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

Alexis Wronzberg, the 27-year-old who received a bone marrow and stem cell transplant from her mother in November at Tel Aviv's Ichilov Hospital, has died.

In late September, Wronzberg suffered a recurrence of acute lymphoblastic leukemia and travelled to Israel for the $300,000 treatment following an urgent fundraising campaign.

Although she showed improvement after the surgery, and a bone marrow biopsy showed no signs of leukemia, she went into sudden liver failure last week.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, the family's synagogue, called Wronzberg a courageous young woman "who had energy and life. She fought many battles and was filled with vitality until the last moment.

"The family was encouraged and strengthened by the outpouring of the community," he said.

At press time, the family was making arrangements to return to Canada, and the funeral was to have taken place on Monday.

Celeb chef cooks up cash for cancer research

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

British celebrity chef Gordon Ramsay of the TV show Hell's Kitchen added star power to the inaugural Chef's Challenge gala and fundraiser in support of cancer research and education at Mount Sinai Hospital.

The Ultimate Battle for a Cure, presented by World Mastercard, was held recently at the Carlu. Some 500 foodies and hospital supporters each raised a minimum of $2,500 to attend.

The top 50 fundraisers got to cook with Ramsay. They were divided into five teams of 10 headed by Canadian celebrity chefs David Rocco, Jamie Kennedy, Lynn Crawford, Mark McEwan and Massimo Capra. Members of the teams took turns cooking three courses, all of which were Ramsay's secret recipes.

Lynn Crawford's team ultimately won the challenge. But Mount Sinai was the real winner. More than $1.1 million was raised for education and research on breast and ovarian cancer.

Ramsay, whose foul mouth and effusive expletives have propelled him to fame, told the participants they were in for a verbal beating. "You paid an absolute fortune to be abused."

But by all accounts Ramsay was on his best behaviour. He praised the 50 participants working at five stations on the stage.

The various courses were judged by Global TV newsman Leslie Roberts, ET Canada's Roz Weston, Florida chef Paula Dasilva and Toronto Star food editor Jennifer Bain. The teams had 20 and 25 minutes to prepare halibut and beef entrees respectively and 20 minutes to prepare dessert, which included compote and cookies. They were awarded points for taste, presentation and creativity.

The 50 participants prepared for the event earlier in the afternoon. A video clip of the "boot camp" showed them with Ramsay, who was in true form, cajoling them as they filleted fish and seared steak.

Mount Sinai board member Harry Lebovic, the participant who raised the most money – $30,018 – told The CJN that the afternoon session with Ramsay was a lot of fun. "He dropped lot of f-bombs, but it was all in good fun."

Ramsay's recipes at the Chef's Challenge were not disclosed to the spectators. However, he has published several cookbooks with a variety of fish recipes. Since halibut was the main ingredient in the first round of the competition, the first recipe below is a halibut dish that has been adapted from Gordon Ramsay Makes It Easy (Quadrille Publishing Ltd., 2005). The second recipe for sea bass comes from Ramsay's Cooking for Friends (HarperCollins, 2008).

Chef Gordon Ramsay

HALIBUT BOURGUIGNON

4 oz. shallots, unpeeled
1-1/2 cups red wine
4 tbsp. olive oil
6 garlic cloves (unpeeled)
4 oz. button mushrooms
2 oz. butter
6 halibut filets, about 6 oz. each, skinned
8 oz. fresh spinach leaves, well washed sea salt to taste

Blanch shallots and garlic in boiling water for 2 minutes, then drain and peel. Boil red wine in a pan until liquid reduces by half. Heat 2 tbsp. olive oil in a heavy-based frying pan. Add shallots, garlic and mushrooms. Sautè until softened and shallots are lightly caramelized. Meanwhile, heat butter and remaining oil in a large frying pan . Pan-fry halibut fillets for 2 to 3 minutes on each side until just cooked. Remove to a warm plate and leave to rest for a few minutes.

Cook spinach in a large pan over medium heat with a little water and a pinch of salt, just until wilted. Drain well. Place spinach in the centre of warmed serving plates and place fish fillets on top. Spoon mushrooms, shallots, and garlic over the fish. Add reduced red wine to the shallot pan over a high heat. Stir to deglaze. Then drizzle wine over fish and vegetables. Makes 6 servings.

SEA BASS WITH OLIVES, TOMATO AND FENNEL

2 whole sea bass, about 1 pound each
2 tbsp. olive oil plus extra oil to rub over fish
1 to 2 medium fennel bulbs, thinly sliced
10 plum or Roma tomatoes, peeled and roughly chopped
1/2 cup sliced black olives
1/2 cup fresh basil, roughly chopped
1/4 cup white wine
salt and pepper to taste

Clean fish and pat down with paper towels. Score fish several times on both sides, then rub fish all over with oil. Sprinkle with a little salt and pepper and set aside.

Preheat oven to 400 F. Heat oil in a stove-to-oven casserole dish wide enough to lay fish side by side. Add fennel, season with salt and pepper and sautè fennel until it begins to soften, about five minutes. Pour in wine, then stir in tomatoes and olives. Scatter half the basil over sauce. Place fish in the casserole and cover with remaining basil.

Transfer casserole to the preheated oven and bake until fish is cooked through, about 15 to 20 minutes. Fish should be opaque at its thickest part. Makes 4 servings.

Susan Mendelson: culinary legend

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

She's a culinary legend in Vancouver, known first for her 10 cookbooks, her fantastic dishes at the Lazy Gourmet take-out and bistro, and her catering company that carries the same name and continues to wow locals with innovative cuisine. Susan Mendelson has been cooking since 1975, when she started selling Nanaimo bars to pay her way through a social work degree. It quickly became obvious to the Toronto native that her true calling was food.

"I thought I'd be retired at this stage of my life," the 58-year-old confesses in a recent interview. "At one point, I gave away all my famous recipes for honey cake, kugel and the like, because I didn't think I'd continue being in the business much longer. But when I tried to slow down a bit, I realized that I love my work too much. It makes me feel good and gives me a strong sense of my own value. So I just want to keep doing it."

Mendelson closed the 26-year-old Lazy Gourmet take-out and bistro in 2005 to focus exclusively on the more profitable side of her business: catering. The catering company has a staff of up to 60 working at events, though that number jumped to 200 during the 2010 Winter Olympics, which Mendelson describes as one of the highlights of her career.

"We did all the catering for PricewaterhouseCoopers, General Electric, the French government as well as events for the Russians, the Polish government and a large party for the British with Princess Anne, among myriad other parties," she says. "We were literally catering for thousands of people, preparing three meals a day for 18 days. It was a riot!"

She recruited her brother, Fred Mendelson, who lives in Toronto, to project manage the entire operation. The result? "The business ran like a Swiss clock – it was extraordinary," she says. "Fred was able to work out all the scheduling and delivery of goods and services 24 hours a day, as many events had to be delivered between midnight and 6 a.m. due to the tight security of the event."

These days, Mendelson has recruited others to prepare her famous Nanaimo bars and come up with new culinary ideas. She oversees the development of recipes and ideas three days a week.

"My general manager, chef, sous-chef, pastry chef and director of operations are the fresh, new faces of the business," she says. Her chef has been with her for 14 years, and many staff have worked for over a decade for the company.

Jewish events "from womb to tomb," says Mendelson, constitute up to 20 per cent of the business, and Lazy Gourmet is still known as a "Jewish caterer." But the focus of the company is food that's sophisticated, chic and elegant, with exceptional presentation and taste. "We want to be on the cutting edge of what's 'in' and trendy," she says.

On her days off you'll find Mendelson doing yoga, gardening at her retreat on B.C.'s Sunshine Coast, hiking and reading with her husband of 21 years, Jack Lutsky.

"He'd like me to be slowing down in the business even more," she says. Lutsky is a big fan of Mendelson's achievements, and has stated on the record that she "introduced a whole new way of eating to Vancouver.

"I think she's one of the most influential people in the cultural and business industry," he said. He nominated her for the Influential Women in Business Award, which she received in 2001.

When she reflects on her culinary success in Vancouver, Mendelson is characteristically modest. "I think I surround myself with people who are smarter than me," she says. "My advice to others is to not be intimidated by anyone who is smarter than you. Rather, get them in your circle."

Now, I have global perspective.

Katsav's lawyers will appeal rape verdict

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Former Israeli president Moshe Katsav's attorneys plan to appeal the Tel Aviv district court's decision to convict him of rape, sexual assault and other sexual abuses.

"Precisely because the verdict was so unequivocal there is room to appeal and to raise the fact that the court ignored the evidence," attorney Avigdor Feldman told Israel Radio after the judges read their decision last Thursday.

"The verdict has created an image of Moshe Katsav as a gambling man, devious and a manipulator," Feldman added. "There is absolutely no basis for that."

When asked whether he really believed that his client was innocent, Feldman declared: "When Moshe Katsav decided to reject the plea bargain, it was clear that he was heading toward a vicious battle... but he decided to do it. I say that it looks like he has been guided by his conscience."

In a separate interview with Army Radio, Feldman expressed concern about the effect this verdict would have on Katsav's mental health. "I hope he will have the strength," Feldman said.

Prosecutor Ronit Emanuel urged journalists as she exited the courtroom to focus first and foremost on the complainants, whose identities have been kept secret for protection. "The public treats them as letters, devoid of names or personalities," Emanuel said.

"We have seen you, through the criminal process, show continued courage and determination in dealing with the events you experienced," she said, addressing her remarks directly to the victims. "Today, we salute you. The message to survivors of harassment is: 'Do not be silent.'

"Today was not an easy day for the State of Israel on the symbolic national plain, not on Mr. Katsav's personal plain," Emanuel added. "But this day teaches us that world leaders and also presidents will be brought court when needed, and that is a symbol of honour for the State of Israel."

The Tel Aviv court found Katsav guilty on two counts of rape, sexual assault, sexual harassment and obstruction of justice. The judges ruled that his version of events was "riddled with lies."

The unanimous verdict was handed down more than four years after complaints surfaced of grave sexual offenses against various subordinates, during Katsav's terms as tourism minister and as president.

Katsav was convicted of raping and sexually assaulting A., a former employee at the Tourism Ministry. He was also convicted of sexually harassing H. from the President's Residence, of sexually abusing and harassing L. from the President's Residence and of obstruction of justice.

The 65-year-old former president was acquitted on only one charge – that he allegedly harassed a witness.

The year-long trial took place almost entirely behind closed doors, and left the public wondering whether Katsav made a wise move when he abruptly dropped out of an extremely lenient plea bargain two years ago.

Moshe Katsav

The plea bargain meant that Katsav would not face the most serious charges and promised him a suspended sentence at worse, but the former president decided he wanted to prove his innocence in court.

As he read the verdict aloud, presiding judge George Karra said that by choosing to reject the plea bargain, Katzav had shuffled the deck, and not in his own favour.

Karra told the court that the long period of time that passed during the trial had led to new evidence arising, which supported A.'s claim and essentially discredited Katsav.

Katsav had tried to charm A., Karra determined, and when she did not respond to his overtures, he began to harass her. The defendant told the victim that he was in love with her, Karra added, and left her feeling humiliated.

"We accept A.'s version of events that the humiliation stemmed from a single reason – that she refused to accept the defendant's sexual advances," the panel of judges ruled.

"While the defence team called this a malicious plot born from A.'s desire to seek revenge against the accused for firing her, the prosecution produced a list of witnesses who testified to having heard A.'s remarks over the course of time between when the event occurred and when the case broke open," Karra said.

"These testimonies disqualify claims of slander," the judges ruled. "All of the testimonies based on what A. said contradict the defendant's claims that this was an invention born of emotion."

The court did not immediately hand down a date for sentencing. In Israel, rape carries a minimum prison sentence of four years and a maximum of 16 years.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said after pronouncement of judgment last Thursday that Katsav's conviction marked a "sad day for the State of Israel and its residents.

"Today the court conveyed two clear-cut messages – that all are equal before the law and that every woman has exclusive rights to her body," Netanyahu said.

Opposition leader and Kadima chair Tzipi Livni echoed that remark, declaring the ruling carried an important message to woman victimized in such ways.

"A day in which an elected public official is convicted of rape is not an easy day for the State of Israel," Livni said. "The court's decision conveys a clear message with regard to public officials, but more importantly, it conveys a message to the victims. It is the responsibility of the society to support those who mustered the courage to come out after all these years.

"In these difficult times for Israeli society, the message should strengthen the weak in society: women and anyone who is victimized," Livni said.

Supreme Court President Dorit Beinisch also said that the conviction represented "a hard day for the State of Israel.

"It is impossible to ignore the verdict that was given today," Beinisch told a swearing-in ceremony for new judges. "This is a sad day, but this is a day demonstrating more than anything what it means to be equal before the law."

Kissinger apologizes for 'gas chamber' comments

JTA

NEW YORK — Henry Kissinger has apologized for remarks he made to then-U.S. president Richard Nixon in 1973 to the effect that it would not be an American concern if the Soviet Union sent its Jews to the gas chambers.

Kissinger issued the apology in an opinion piece in the Washington Post that appeared on its website Dec. 24 but is dated Dec. 26.

The recently released remarks, recorded in the Oval Office, were taken out of context, Kissinger wrote.

"For someone who lost in the Holocaust many members of my immediate family and a large proportion of those with whom I grew up, it is hurtful to see an out-of-context remark being taken so contrary to its intentions and to my convictions, which were profoundly shaped by these events," Kissinger wrote. "References to gas chambers have no place in political discourse, and I am sorry I made that remark 37 years ago."

Kissinger made the controversial remarks after a meeting he and Nixon had with then-Israeli prime minister Golda Meir on March 1, 1973, in which Meir pleaded for the United States to put pressure on the Soviet Union to release its Jews. Nixon and Kissinger, who was then U.S. secretary of state, dismissed the plea after Meir left.

"The emigration of Jews from the Soviet Union is not an objective of American foreign policy," Kissinger is reported to have said on the tapes. "And if they put Jews into gas chambers in the Soviet Union, it is not an American concern. Maybe a humanitarian concern."

Nixon replied, "I know. We can't blow up the world because of it."

Six months later, during the Yom Kippur War, Nixon rejected Kissinger's advice to delay an arms airlift to Israel as a means of setting the stage for an Egypt confident enough to pursue peace. Among other reasons, Nixon cited Israel's urgent need for the arms.

Kissinger wrote in the Washington Post that his comments weren't a "policy statement," but were made in response to a request by Nixon that he try to encourage several vocal senators to agree to stick with quiet diplomacy in order to get Jews out of the Soviet Union.

Elan Steinberg, vice president of the American Gathering of Holocaust Survivors and their Descendants, responded to the op-ed piece in a statement issued Sunday.

"It is a shame that it took two weeks and the Jewish public's expression of shock and moral indignation for Henry Kissinger to at last apologize for his grotesque comments," Steinberg stated. "As a result of this sad episode, for many of us, our view of Dr. Kissinger will never be the same."

Could Hungarian antisemitism get out of control?

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

BUDAPEST — The rise of Hungary's far-right Jobbik Party has ratcheted up the debate about antisemitism in this country and focused attention on the seeming paradoxes of Jewish life here.

On the one hand, a recent article in Germany's Der Spiegel described Budapest as "Europe's capital of anti-Semitism," where Jews are "being openly intimidated" and making plans to leave the country.

On the other, Hungary is home to a flourishing and multifaceted Jewish life that finds vigorous public expression in religious, cultural and even culinary ways, and also enjoys high-profile government recognition.

I saw this myself at Chanukah when I munched on latkes at a Friday night Oneg Shabbat, sampled doughnuts at a sit-down dinner for Holocaust survivors, joined 20-somethings at a riotous klezmer/hip-hop gig, and just missed witnessing the foreign minister, Budapest's mayor and other VIPs help light a big menorah set up in the centre of town.

Antisemitism remains a serious concern in this central European country. But according to Adam LeBor, a Budapest-based Jew writing in The Economist, the Der Spiegel article was a "one-sided screed" that portrayed the Jewish experience in Hungary "solely through the warped prism of antisemitism rather than its much more complex, and healthy, reality."

A timely and important new book puts contemporary Hungarian antisemitism into perspective. Based on studies carried out since the early 1990s, The Stranger at Hand: Antisemitic Prejudices in Post-Communist Hungary is the most comprehensive analysis to date of the scope and impact of the phenomenon. It's just too bad that its $131 price tag will put it out of reach of many potential readers.

Written by Andras Kovacs, a sociologist at Budapest's Central European University who has devoted decades to tracking both the development of antisemitism and the development of Jewish life and identity here, the book presents a highly complex and sometimes contradictory picture.

A large part of Hungarian society, both Jewish and non-Jewish, is convinced that antisemitism has increased in Hungary since the fall of communism, Kovacs writes.

"What is said on the street, written in newspapers, and heard on the radio can and does give rise to concern," he writes. "Are the fears legitimate?"

The answer, he told JTA in an interview, is a mix of yes, no and maybe.

Jobbik, with its antisemitic rhetoric and virulently anti-Roma, or Gypsy, political platform, won nearly 17 per cent of the vote in April elections and entered Parliament as Hungary's third-largest party. But recent evidence shows that it has been losing support amid divisive internal squabbles, and newly imposed legal measures have clamped down hard on its once-feared paramilitary wing, the Hungarian Guard.

Still, Jobbik did not emerge from thin air, and Kovacs' book traces the evolution of several antisemitic trends against a shifting background of political and social change.

He identifies three main types of antisemitism in Hungary. The first is "classic" anti-Jewish prejudice, based on social and religious stereotypes that date back centuries and were kept alive, if suppressed, under communism. The second occurs when antisemitism becomes a sort of "language and culture" that fosters a general antisemitic worldview. The third is political antisemitism, "where political activists discover that they can mobilize certain social groups by using antisemitic slogans to achieve their own goals."

Kovacs' research shows the recent growth in antisemitism to be qualitative rather than quantitative. Surveys show that 10 to 15 per cent of Hungarians are hard-core antisemites, while another 25 per cent nurtures anti-Jewish prejudices to some degree.

Contrary to popular perception, Kovacs said, these figures "have increased to some extent but not dramatically over the past 17 years."

What is different and much more alarming, according to Kovacs, is how the type and expression of antisemitism is changing within that proportion. For one thing, the percentage of political antisemites has grown. These political antisemites, he said, are "more urban, better educated and relatively younger" than they tended to be in the past.

Jobbik's key leaders, for example, are youthful, clean cut, and media and Internet-savvy – factors that helped enhance their appeal ahead of the April vote.

Related to this is the way hate speech among the general public has been emboldened by the open use of antisemitic and anti-Roma rhetoric by extreme right public figures. Kovacs calls this a "dangerous dynamic."

He said young people in particular frequently seem to lose their inhibitions, and their use of slurs against Jews and Roma often goes unchecked by parents, teachers and other authority figures.

"We know that people are much more cautious in expressing their prejudices if they think that it is not legitimate," Kovacs said. "But when they realize that so-called important people use this language openly, they feel they can use it as well. This is what we feel now in Budapest."

What follows is unclear. So far, Jobbik's anti-Jewish rhetoric seems aimed at creating a body of like-minded followers rather than serving as a rallying cry for concrete political action against Jews, according to Kovacs.

But could the extreme right eventually elevate political antisemitism into a force with significant mainstream influence?

Kovacs thinks it's unlikely, but ultimately, he writes in his book, it will depend on how Hungary's mainstream cultural and political leaders react to any attempts to "transform the prejudice that once affected the margins of Hungarian society into a language, culture and ideology."

Population grows

Some 7,695,000 people currently live in Israel, according to a study by Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics, released to mark the end of the first decade of the third millennium. Of that number, 5,802,000 (75.4 per cent) are Jewish, 1,573,000 (20.4 per cent) are Arab and 320,000 (4.2 per cent) are of other ethnicity. The statistics show that the population in Israel grew by 143,000 (1.9 per cent) in 2010, a similar growth rate to that of the rest of the decade.

Shoah victims identified

Yad Vashem says it has identified two-thirds of the Jews murdered in the Holocaust. In the last decade, Israel's Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority has added about 1.4 million names to its central database of Shoah victims' names, bringing the total number of names registered to about 4 million. "One of Yad Vashem's central missions since its foundation, the recovery of each and every victim's name and personal story, has resulted in relentless efforts to restore the names and identities of as many of the six million Jews murdered by the Nazis and their accomplices as possible," said Yad Vashem chair Avner Shalev. "We will continue our efforts to recover the unknown names, and by harnessing technology in the service of memory, we are able to share their names with the world." In 2004, Yad Vashem launched the central database of Shoah victims' names onto its website with three million names. Names are recovered via Pages of Testimony, special forms filled out in memory of the victims by those who remember them, and by combing archival lists and documentation for names. Of the four million names now known, some 2.2 million come from Pages of Testimony and the remainder from various archival sources and postwar commemoration projects.

Natural gas found

A natural gas field discovered in Israel's territorial waters contains about 16 trillion cubic feet of the natural resource. The size of the natural gas field discovered earlier this year in drilling off the Mediterranean coast near Haifa and dubbed Leviathan was confirmed by electrical log tests, whose results were announced last Wednesday by Noble Energy Inc. Leviathan is almost double the size of the Tamar field, discovered off Israel's Mediterranean coast in 2009. "This discovery has the potential to position Israel as a natural gas exporting nation," Noble Energy president David L. Stover said. The field is considered to be the largest discovery in the history of the Houston-based company, which has a controlling interest in the field.

Canadian co-founds Jewish environmental web portal

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — The recent launch of Jewcology.com marked a small victory for Jewish communities everywhere and for the environment.

Jewcology.com is an online social media portal and resource database aimed at promoting environmental activism throughout the Jewish world.

Evonne Marzouk

Noam Dolgin

The brainchild of Evonne Marzouk, founder and executive director of Canfei Nesharim, a Washington, D.C.-based, Torah-inspired environmental organization, Jewcology.com was created by 19 Jewish environmentalists from the United States, Canada, Israel, China and Chile.

They aimed to create a place for Jewish environmental activists to pool their resources, express their concerns and gather their expertise, and to conduct global campaigns aimed at mobilizing Jewish communities everywhere to act on the uniquely Jewish responsibility to protect the environment.

"The Jewish community is waking up to its environmental responsibility and is looking for resources to do the right thing," said Noam Dolgin, the Canadian co-founder of Jewcology.com. He's the Vancouver-based executive director of the Green Zionist Alliance, a non-profit aimed at mobilizing Jews around the world to protect Israel's environment and support its environmental movement.

"Jewcology.com will help Jewish environmental professional and lay leaders connect with each other, share the latest ideas and co-ordinate community-wide campaigns," Dolgin said.

He connected to Jewcology's other 18 co-founders via the ROI (Return on Investment) Community for Young Jewish Innovators, a global network of 20- and 30-something Jewish community leaders from 40 countries established jointly by American Jewish philanthropist Lynn Schusterman's Center for Leadership Initiatives and Taglit-Birthright Israel in 2006.

ROI awarded Jewcology.com $50,000 (US), one of five Innovation Fund grants distributed by ROI in 2010.

"Jewcology.com is the biggest and brightest example of the sort of collaboration that has emerged since we founded ROI," said ROI director Justin Korda, who's originally from Montreal. "It underscores the power of the global network of young Jewish innovators that we've been nurturing since 2006."

Jewcology.com is able to involve the participation of so many members of the ROI network, said Korda, by virtue of the fact that the environmental cause is so multi-faceted.

"The environmental cause unites people from a lot of different fields, who come at the issue from different directions," he said. "[Jewcology.com] gives Jews from all over the world a home to congregate in on environmental issues, without barriers of language and geography."

In addition, said Korda, Jewcology.com fulfils an important ROI project objective – that it's inspired by Jewish values. While all ROI members tackle the environmental cause from different angles, they are like-minded when it comes to their belief in the relevance of Jewish tradition to modern environmental challenges.

"The platform reveals how Jewish values inspire [the Jewish] commitment to strike a more harmonious relationship with the world and lead a more environmentally sound existence," said Korda, who lists a few core Jewish environmental principles – the mitzvot baal tashchit [do not waste], tza'ar baalei chayim [proper treatment of animals] and l'ovdah u'l'shomerah [to work and guard] the world," Korda said.

Dolgin added that "Jewish law and ethics deal with a wide range of questions regarding our relationship to the world and each other. These basic concepts address many of the same questions that we are facing today as our current ecological crisis threatens people and the planet.

"By empowering Jewish environmentalists to help the Jewish community address environmental issues, Jewcology.com will help the entire Jewish community understand the relevance of Jewish tradition to the modern environmental challenge, making Judaism more meaningful and relevant for the 21st century."

So far, some 50 Jewish environmental activists and organizations, among them COEJL (Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life), Hazon, the Shalom Center and the Teva Learning Center, have uploaded more than 300 resources in English, Hebrew, and Spanish to the site, including Jewish teachings, environmental texts, discussion questions, synagogue projects, blog posts, and awareness activity plans ranging in topic from vegetarianism, water, energy and agriculture to trees, food, recycling, and Jewish holidays.

The site features a special "community" for Canadian educators and activists, the Canadian Jewish Environmental Network.

"While many environmental concerns are global and require the same response worldwide, others are local and require a local response," Dolgin said. "By having Canadian perspectives reflected on Jewcology.com, we will be able to share some of our unique successes and challenges with the global community, and we can provide a valuable resource to other Canadians looking for responses to regional environmental concerns."

Jewcology.com is committed to taking the relationships formed online, offline, by hosting a variety of face-to-face meetings. Regional leadership training summits for Jewish environmentalists are planned for next March in Los Angeles and Baltimore, Md., and for next June in upstate New York.

One joint initiative, of the Green Zionist Alliance, Hazon, COEJL and the American Zionist Movement, the "Green Israel Summit," took place in New York this past October.

"The Jewish environmental movement has always been a very collaborative movement, and there are a number of collaborations already underway between members of Jewcology.com. We hope that Jewcology.com will strengthen these connections and produce new partnership as well," Dolgin said.

"Through this combined approach, we can reduce our footprint and become an efficient 'light unto the nations.'"

Number of U.S. Jews higher than thought

JTA

NEW YORK — The American Jewish population is larger than suspected, according to new estimates compiled by Brandeis University.

The suburban Boston university's Steinhardt Social Research Institute is estimating that there are some 6.5 million people in the United States who are either Jewish by religion or who self-identify as Jewish. The figure represents a 20 per cent increase in the number of Jews since 1990.

The numbers were drawn from a synthesis of data from more than 150 nationwide surveys conducted by the U.S. government and other agencies, as well as from national polling organizations.

They refute information gathered in the last National Jewish Population Survey, a census-like study that had been conducted every decade by the Jewish federation system before being discontinued this year. The final survey showed that between 1990 and 2000-01, the population dropped from 5.5 million to 5.2 million.

A parallel polling by Brandeis of 1,400 Jews revealed that more than 80 per cent of respondents who indicated they are Jewish identify as such by religion, while the rest identify as Jewish by other criteria.

According to the study, 1.27 million Jews who identify by religion are younger than 18. The Steinhardt centre has not yet broken down other demographic data from the survey, but will roll out more information about demographics, socioeconomic status and other areas over the course of the next year, the centre's director, Len Saxe, told JTA.

Israeli housing: go north and south, young couple

By ARIK MIROVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — What is "central Israel"? It's an area comprising roughly 20 per cent of the country where housing prices are sky high. What is the "periphery"? It's everywhere else where housing prices are a lot lower. Yet it appears that the map of the Israeli real estate market has been undergoing creeping change in the last 10 years, and it's been changing the map of investment in property as well.

Analyses by the Central Bureau of Statistics, Tax Authority and the state assessor at the Justice Ministry previously agreed that Israeli housing prices were constantly rising. Yet recently, while the stats bureau says the increase has continued, the state assessor's figures show a nuanced picture. They show that housing prices in the big cities – Tel Aviv, Netanya, Petah Tikva and Be'er Sheva – haven't changed, and in some cases, they've even inched down. Yet prices in the country's outskirts have been rising, the assessor says.

Whoever has it right, what's clear is that the boom marking recent years, especially 2008 and 2009, has halted by and large. But a breakdown by area shows unexpected details.

In recent years billions of shekels have been spent on dwellings for investment purposes. The State Revenue Administration says that from 2002 to 2007, the number of dwellings bought for investment purposes (to rent out) ran at almost 29,000 a year. The trend paused in 2008 as the global economic crisis gathered steam, but resumed and even spiked in 2009: a third of housing purchases that year were for investment.

In 2010, the trend dipped again to about a quarter of housing purchases, suggesting investors were searching for other types of assets that would bring them higher returns.

Returns on housing consist of two elements: rent and an increase in asset value. Today, given the sky-high housing prices, the return on rent is low and apparently investors feel that housing prices aren't likely to rise anymore. Hence the search for something different.

If anything, investors have been selling dwellings they bought in Haifa and Be'er Sheva, says the State Revenue Administration. Evidently they think housing prices won't be rising anymore, so they'd better get out now.

A perusal of the statistics suggests the debate on housing is lagging far behind the reality. While the argument rages over how to contain housing prices, the slope has been flattening. But not everywhere.

Most of the action has been in central Israel. About half to 60 per cent of all housing transactions (for living in, not investment) in the last 10 years have been in the strip from Ashdod to Netanya, while the proportion of home purchases in the Galilee and Negev was just 25 per cent. Before the high-tech bubble burst in the early 2000s, the discrepancy was even greater.

Figures from the Central Bureau of Statistics show that from 1991 to 2009, the number of people moving to the centre exceeded the number moving out by 178,000. But the demographic balance in Haifa and the north was negative: 91,000 moved away in that time. And around 124,000 more people abandoned the south in those years than moved there.

So while the real estate market in central Israel flourished, the weight of the peripheral areas diminished, bottoming out in late 2006 and early 2007 as people shuddered from the memories of the Second Lebanon War.

As demand diminished in the outskirts, so did construction. And while home prices in the periphery stagnated, prices in the popular centre soared. The average price of an apartment in Tel Aviv rose from 800,000 shekels ($225,000 Cdn) in 2003 to 1.7 million shekels ($477,000 Cdn) today.

The result of these processes was the patent absurdity demonstrated in a paper by Eli Stern and Yair Duchin for the Housing Ministry that concluded that the value of land in Ma'alot Tarshiha ranged from minus $3,530 for high-density units to minus $6,052 for a family house. That means the cost of building materials and construction itself outstripped the value of the land, so there was no incentive to build.

In Tirat Carmel, the value of land per housing unit was minus $3,865 per family home and minus $2,558 per unit of high-density building. No chance of anybody building there, the academics concluded.

In short, all development converged on central Israel, lifting prices there sharply while prices elsewhere languished. That, however, has led to a change in trend, because people are concluding they can't afford to buy in the centre, so they're starting to look elsewhere.

The creeping change in trend appears to have started in 2005. The number of deals in Caesarea-Hadera-Binyamina increased, rising from 500 transactions a quarter in 2005 to 800 in 2007 and more than 900 in 2009 and 2010.

From the second half of 2007, the weight of home purchases (not property for investment) in the Negev and the Galilee increased from 20 to 25 per cent to 30 to 35 per cent.

In the Upper Galilee, the average number of home deals per quarter has risen from between 300 and 400 in 2004 to 800 these days. In the Lower Galilee, the number per quarter has risen from 300 to around 700 this year. In Be'er Sheva, the number rose from 2,200 at the start of the decade to about 3,500 this year.

Most of the increase in deal flow in the periphery is people buying homes for themselves, but they're increasingly being joined by investors who have been targeting mainly Haifa and Be'er Sheva. Evidently, they feel the upward potential in prices there hasn't been exhausted.

As a result, the number of transactions in which people are buying for investment purposes has risen from 20 per cent to around 33 per cent in Haifa in the last 10 years. For Be'er Sheva, the increase is from 20 per cent to 36 per cent.

In short, the price discrepancy between the periphery and central Israel has greatly narrowed in the last decade. It's possible that the state assessor has it right and that housing prices will continue to rise in the outskirts while halting, at least to a degree, in the centre. But it could also be argued that housing prices in the periphery have lots of room to rise, while that isn't so in the centre anymore.

RE/MAX predicts 2011 housing price increase

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — RE/MAX Israel owner Bernard Raskin said last week he expects apartment prices in Israel to rise between four per cent and 12 per cent in 2011. Speaking at an end-of-year press conference, Raskin noted that local franchises of the global real estate agency chalked up a 30 per cent increase in sales over 2009.

"The Housing and Construction Ministry frightens the developers and drives them away on the grounds that if they build their project it won't be profitable," Raskin said. "The developers are genuinely skittish about building, and as a result, there's no new construction. Contrary to the forecasts of the government, prices will continue to rise, in my estimation by between four per cent and 12 per cent in 2011.

"The purpose of the Housing and Construction Ministry is to free up land and not to interfere with the economic feasibility of building," he said.

Raskin heaped praise on Bank of Israel governor Stanley Fischer, calling him the man of the year for heading off a housing bubble.

"Fischer saw to a conservative banking system in the country and today it is not easy to get a mortgage in Israel. Anyone seeking to purchase a home has to carefully consider whether they'll still be able to meet their mortgage payments once interest rates rise to more normal levels," he said.

Raskin also said the government should stop trying to drive investors buying rental properties out of the market.

"Today even the government realizes that not every one can afford to purchase an apartment and that's also the conclusion from what happened in the United States. The upshot of the government's plan is that there will be fewer rental apartments available. In Tel Aviv, for example, where a lot of young people want to rent small apartments, in my opinion the city should have created standards for splitting up larger apartments instead of trying to eliminate the practice," he said.

CBC radio host honoured for her work

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

CBC Radio's Writers & Company celebrated its 20th anniversary at the International Festival of Authors with the taping of a special panel discussion moderated by Eleanor Wachtel, host of the show since its inception in 1990.

Over the years, her in-depth interviews with such celebrated authors as Amos Oz, Saul Bellow, Jonathan Franzen, Doris Lessing and Oliver Sacks have garnered Wachtel, 63, a loyal following.

Some of these listeners had an opportunity to pay tribute to her at the Writers & Company 20th anniversary event. English author Margaret Drabble, who was on the panel, brought the audience to its feet when she introduced Wachtel: "One of the highlights of coming to Canada is the hope of seeing Eleanor again," she told the 450 people who packed the Fleck Dance Theatre.

"In an age of dumbing down, Eleanor lifts us up. She is serious, but never solemn. She makes us laugh and she makes us think."

The standing ovation that followed continued even as the Writers & Company theme song began to play. Wachtel, visibly embarrassed, restarted the music, editing out most of the applause for the Oct. 31 broadcast.

Musing about this event in a recent interview at CBC headquarters, Wachtel said she was moved by the show of appreciation. "I wasn't expecting a standing a ovation...

"I was very touched by what Margaret said and that she came [from London] especially for that event."

Festivities for the 20th anniversary continued in December when Wachtel shared the stage with Canadian novelist Michael Ondaatje. The Bram & Bluma Appel Salon at the Metropolitan Toronto Reference Library was filled to capacity for the interview. But on this occasion, the roles were reversed and it was Ondaatje who asked the questions. "I think we were both a little tense," Wachtel told The CJN.

But in a two-hour interview heavily infused with goodwill and humour, the tension was not detectable from the audience's standpoint. Wachtel noted that Ondaatje encouraged her to write, and he pointed out that she belonged in the interviewee hot seat.

Wachtel has published four books of interviews: Writers &Company (Knopf Canada,1993), More Writers & Company (Knopf Canada,1996), Original Minds (HarperCollins, 2003) and Random Illuminations: Conversations with Carol Shields (Goose Lane Editions, 2007) and she has contributed to several literary anthologies.

She has also reaped many honours. She said she was "totally thrilled" to be named a member of the Order of Canada in 2005, "especially since I don't know how it happened."

Her eight honorary degrees were also a surprise. "It just feels like something of a blessing from heaven."

It's all pretty impressive, especially for a journalism school dropout. Wachtel is virtually self-trained. She learned to do the hour-long interviews on the job, but she stresses that the research and preparation are a team effort.

The Montreal native – she grew up in Snowdon – is the youngest of three. She said she was raised in a home where education and reading were valued. She recalled "schlepping to the library by streetcar and bus" with her mother, but she traces her interest in literature to the influence of her intellectually precocious friends in high school.

Wachtel majored in English literature at university, and by happenstance, she did an art column for the McGill Daily. "One year, someone from high school remembered that I was interested in books."

However, the experience did not jumpstart a career in journalism."I was a late starter. It took me a long time to know what I wanted to do," Wachtel said.

In the mid-'70s, she began freelancing for magazines and radio. "I liked doing both, but the rhythm of radio suited me better."

CBC offered Wachtel a full-time radio job in Toronto as an arts commentator in 1987. "It was only a one-year contract," she laughed. "And here it is 23 years later."

She's held multiple positions, including a 12-year stint hosting The Arts Tonight, while doing Writers & Company. She also does Wachtel on the Arts, a monthly arts program.

Wachtel said she's proud to have interviewed so many Nobel laureates, "many before they won" the coveted literary prize.

There have been many other career coups. For instance, after 17 years of trying, she scored an interview with American novelist Philip Roth. She described him as "surprisingly genial."

She said a highlight of the 2010 season was a three-hour meeting with English spy novelist John le Carré at his home on a remote coast in Cornwall. She recounted how he capped the afternoon with a celebratory bottle of champagne. "That was a first."

And so was experiencing a major earthquake. Last February, Wachtel arrived in Chile hours before the earthquake struck. "I never really doubted that I would be able to do my interviews. But my interviewees were rather surprised to hear from me."

Looking back over the last 20 years, Wachtel said she's privileged to be doing work that she loves so much. "I feel extremely lucky. I have the best job in the world."

Writers and Company airs on Sundays and Tuesdays at 3 p.m., and its weekly podcast is free. For more information go to cbc.ca/writersandcompany.

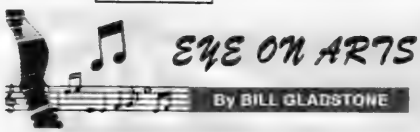

EXHIBITION SPOTLIGHTS WOMEN'S AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL COMICS

The Koffler Gallery has focused its energies on a continuing series of projects around the city of Toronto. Koffler exhibitions may be turning up in unexpected places over the next few years as the Koffler Centre of the Arts prepares for the anticipated opening of its new arts and cultural centre at the Sherman Campus in 2014.

In keeping with its status as gallery-in-exile, the Koffler Gallery presents the international touring exhibition Graphic Details: Confessional Comics by Jewish Women at the Gladstone Hotel. The ground-breaking, touring exhibition, which opens in mid-February, features the works of 18 Canadian and international artists.

Graphic Details provides the first in-depth look at Jewish women's autobiographical comics through original drawings, full comic books and graphic novels. Artists include Vanessa Davis, Bernice Eisenstein, Sarah Glidden, Miriam Katin, Aline Kominsky-Crumb, Miss Lasko-Gross, Sarah Lazarovic, Miriam Libicki, Sarah Lightman, Diane Noomin, Corinne Pearlman, Trina Robbins, Racheli Rotner, Sharon Rudahl, Laurie Sandell, Ariel Schrag, Lauren Weinstein and Ilana Zeffren.

Many of the original artworks on display have never been exhibited in public until now. The exhibition "illuminates the intersection of experiences that make these diaristic comics so compelling," a Koffler press release advises.

"By turns funny, outrageous, poignant and embarrassingly intimate, the works in Graphic Details reflect the artists' individual journeys, refracted through a distinctively Jewish lens in a pop-culture art form. Some bare their bodies. Some expose their psyches. All are fearless about sex, romance, politics, body functions, experiences, emotions and desires."

Graphic Details will be on view at the Gladstone Hotel from Feb. 17 to April 17. The co-curators are Michael Kaminer, a New York journalist and collector whose 2008 story on confessional comics in the Forward provided the impetus for the show; and Lightman, a London-based artist and arts journalist.

Sharp character studies from a bygone era

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

In The Pool, a young girl supposedly doing her homework, secretly watches Ficksen, the gardener, outside cleaning the pool.

In Bottle, Bella, a nanny, revels in the splendour of her first-ever trip to the beach.

In The Letter, a mother anxiously awaits the arrival of a letter from her teenage son whom she hasn't seen since he left the country.

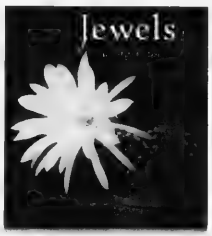
Jewels and other stories (Tsar Publications) is a collection of short fiction that offers a unique perspective on life in 1970s apartheid-era South Africa.

The author, Dawn Promislow, was born and raised in Johannesburg and left with her family for Britain in 1977, ultimately arriving in Canada in 1987.

The diverse characters in all her stories come from both sides of the apartheid divide – black and white, poor and rich, domestic and house owner.

Ficksen, the black gardener, watches the white children of his employer swim in the pool, yearning to swim in it himself someday.

While Bella, the nanny in Bottle, captures the joy of the Indian Ocean in a pop bottle, her husband, a security guard, has to take two buses and walk two miles to get to work. They only see each other one day a month.



Through her strong, remarkable characters, Promislow makes this shameful world of segregated beaches, corrugated tin roofs, pass books, "the natives," the Special Branch and malnourished children come alive.

Several stories are told from the points of view of young children, such as Billy, a poor, hungry boy who loves to listen to his mother's stories about her and her tribe. "Her stories, unlike the stream and her milk, never dried up. They flowed always in her, as fluid and abundant as the most fertile river."

Rivers and water are recurring images in many stories.

Several stories are connected by similar characters, but different viewpoints. In Billy, for instance, Billy is taken by his father, a gardener, to spend two weeks at the house of his employers. In Our Story/His Story, white siblings eagerly await the arrival of their new guest, the young son of their black gardner.

In The Letter, one of the most moving stories in this collection, Rose, a young mother, anxiously awaits word from her son who fled to neighbouring Zambia to train as a "freedom fighter." In Freedom Fighter, a young man – Rose's son perhaps? – eagerly waits to be taken across the border to Zambia. Rife with rich imagery and lush description, Jewels and other stories, is a wonderful collection of 14 character studies from a thankfully bygone era.

Poet writes loving paeans to Bathurst Manor

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

"I mean, how many people write poems about Wilmington Avenue?"

Karen Shenfeld doesn't need to answer her own rhetorical and self-referencing question. The response is plain: she does, and particularly well.

Her religiously, biblically and Holocaust-tinged poems have won plaudits for their tenderness, beauty and power.

In her newest volume, My Father's Hands Spoke in Yiddish (Guernica Editions), a number of the verses are loving paeans to Bathurst Manor, the Toronto Jewish suburb of prefab bungalows, manicured lawns and no shortage of synagogues.

In the hands of a less sensitive writer, "the Manor," as many of its current and former inhabitants call it, could be the subject of derision. After all, poetry and bland, postwar suburbia have rarely been yoked successfully.

But Shenfeld has a soft spot for the neighbourhood where she was raised.

"I think that for me and kids of my generation, growing up there, it was a kind of utopia," the poet tells me over cups of latté in the Little Italy neighbourhood she's called home for 26 years. "I didn't realize it until after I wrote one poem about playing in Bathurst Manor that the key thing was, we weren't watched in the way that I watched my son all the time. I went to kindergarten on my own, running down Wilmington, away from the parental gaze."

Only later did suburbia become "boring" and "stultifying" and "I certainly had no desire to live as an adult there." Like many young adults, she felt the need to escape her old surroundings' tidiness and "cultural homogeneity, which I associated with sterility and repression," Shenfeld told the Toronto Quarterly literary and arts journal recently.

Still, it's the reader who wins. Shenfeld's poems, though spare and taut, evoke a lushness and nostalgia one might associate with a much older writer's folkloric memories of a European shtetl. In one offering, she spies "the Golem of Bathurst Manor cruising Wilmington Avenue in Rabbi Kelman's turquoise Chevrolet." (The protective Golem may come in handy one day, she writes).

The streets of her childhood "carried names of English towns. We skipped up Wilmington to the public school, chanting the blocks aloud: Searle, Brighton, Acton, Combe. Home was an L-shaped bungalow, floating on a sea of grass."

Shenfeld, a remarkably youthful-looking 54, has published three books of poetry: The Law of Return (1999), which won the Canadian Jewish Book Award for poetry in 2001; The Fertile Crescent (2005); and her latest, whose title came to her after watching her father as he lay dying.

"His hands went up," Shenfeld recalls, her own hands mimicking a sudden downward swoop, as though bricks dropped, "and fell down. He really did do that. I started playing around with that – that he spoke with his hands, and somehow, the line turned into, 'oh my God, his hands spoke in Yiddish.' "

My father's hands spoke in Yiddish, the ganze megillah of curses,
complaints.

Ever in motion,
they argued with themselves.

Gai kochen aufen yam! my father's hands said. Go s--t in the sea!

In the mamaloshen,
they spoke their last, impatient words,
rose palms up from the narrow bed -

Nu? Shoyn!
All right already!

then fell like bricks.

Their final kvetch
bemusing the angel of death.

"That's what poets do," she explains. "You kind of go into a dream state and you hallucinate. I was in terrible, terrible grief but that poem does have humour in it."

Born in Toronto to Canadian parents (her mother's father, Arthur Parker, was the city's first Jewish doctor), Shenfeld attended afternoon Hebrew classes at Beth Emeth synagogue, where, amid the usual horseplay, the cadences and rich imagery of the Bible and readings inspired her. "I recognized the incandescence of the texts, even at a very young age."

After studying poetry at York University with the late Irving Layton, "I didn't follow the predictable path of the nice Jewish girl who went to Mackenzie [Collegiate] and got married and moved to Thornhill." Instead, she spent years travelling the world, including hitchhiking across the Sahara Desert. That experience infused much of her earlier work.

A noted filmmaker and freelance writer, Shenfeld is in a unique position to explain the difference between her journalism and poetry. "I start with the truth in a poem and then I twist it, I prevaricate, I could lie. It's not so much that I'm interested in telling the whole truth and nothing but the truth."

And while a great exercise in self-expression, "a poem only works when you are reaching someone else," she concedes.

Her range extends beyond the Manor, whether she's exploring burlesque dancers or canoeing or the cantillation of a Maftir – all in short, crystalline lines.

Is the craft any easier than it was in her teens? "Certainly," Shenfeld replies. "Now I have more to say."

Play asks some difficult questions

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

Hard Love, the newest production from Teatron Theatre, asks some difficult questions.

"In this play, the questions that come up are loyalty to a spouse... in contrast with loyalty to God, to the divine," says Ari Weisberg, Teatron Theatre's founder and artistic director.

Hard Love is by Israeli playwright Motti Lerner. It tells the story of Hannah and Zvi, an Israeli couple whose marriage was short-lived, ending when Zvi left his Orthodox roots behind in Jerusalem and embraced secularism in Tel Aviv. Twenty years later they are reunited when their children from their second marriages meet and fall in love. Hannah and Zvi then realize they still have feelings for each other.

"I fell in love with this play when I saw it in New York last year," Weisberg says. "It's a play that is very fitting with our mandate.

"It's very engaging," he adds. "There is a back and forth between the philosophies of the two main characters, and it draws you in right from the start. It is well written."

The stars of the play, Tara Nicodemo and Howard Rosenstein, bring something very special to this particular adaptation, Weisberg says.

"Our two actors starring in this play are two fantastic veteran professional actors. And what they've managed, with my direction, to bring out in this play is fantastic. Every rehearsal, every day we get together, we find new meanings, new twists and new angles to this beautiful play."

Hard Love is Teatron's second play of the season. The third play, A Hamburger in a Pita, is written by CJN columnist Nina Shenhav and runs March 2 to 13.

Hard Love runs to Jan. 16 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. For tickets, call 416-781-5527 or visit www.teatrontheatre.com.

Singer introduces her audience to rare Ladino songs

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Donna Greenberg's second CD, Mav'rik, is an eclectic mix of 12 original songs she wrote that cross several genres and languages.

Mav'rik features songs performed in several styles, including jazz, salsa, lullaby, Celtic folk, tango, swing and bossa nova. Working in the tradition of 20th-century popular songwriters, the singer-songwriter says she brings this musical craft full circle for the new millennium, and she hopes listeners will be especially touched by her lyrics.

The CD enlists some of Toronto's most in-demand musicians. The producer and musical director is Jordan Klapman, and the arrangements and orchestrations are Tony Quarrington's.

Mav'rik will be launched with a special pre-Valentine's Day concert. Greenberg will be joined on stage by Klapman on piano, drummer Glenn Anderson, Henry Heillig playing bass and Tom Skublics on clarinet, flute and sax, along with special guest, trumpeter Jon Seiger.

"The concert is a special evening because we are bringing the music we created on Mav'rik to a live audience. From a young age, I have written songs, and now as a performer and recording artist, I am able to realize my dream of sharing my music on stage and seeing people's reactions," Greenberg says.

"Creating music with these musicians, especially Jordon Klapman, is a great experience because my music is coming alive, not just through my voice, but through the interpretations of the other musicians. For me as a songwriter, it is a thrill."

Greenberg loves to introduce audiences to rare and unusual musical finds. One such find are songs sung in Ladino – a mixture of Spanish and Hebrew that was once used in Spain. In 1442, during the Spanish Inquisition, Jews who were expelled left with a knowledge of this language.

"Ladino is a fantastic tradition of Sephardi Jewish music," says Greenberg. "Years ago, I was in New York City searching for sheet music and found this Ladino music. Then, back in Toronto, I went to hear the late, Spanish Catalan operatic soprano, Victoria de Los Angeles, and she sang those songs in concert. They were so beautiful that I wanted to learn them, and I already had the songbook."

Greenberg says her Jewish background affects her very much as a sensibility – an awareness of people and the fragility of life.

"As a singer, what I write about means a lot to me and that caring comes from my Jewish roots," says Greenberg. "Specifically, my song The Springtime of Our Love from Mav'rik was inspired by Jewish stories from World War II.

"There is Jewishness to my music – a lot of people tell me that they hear it. I feel my Jewish heritage reflects both my songwriting, and as a performer includes my choice of songs stemming from a long list of Jewish songwriters."

Before realizing her dream as a singer-songwriter, Greenberg was an accomplished choreographer, dancer and dance filmmaker. Her early influences include jazz, opera, classical music, musical theatre and liturgical music. She graduated from the University of Toronto with a BA in English literature. Greenberg continued her education with extensive musical training, making her a sought-after classical solo artist who has performed in many languages, a skill reflected in Mav'rik.

Greenberg's first foray into jazz was a one-woman show, A Tribute to Gershwin, Porter and Rodgers, for which she sang, danced and wrote. Now, jazz is the mainstay of her live performances. Greenberg has been collaborating with Klapman since her debut release, Stranger, in 2009. Stranger hit the Top 30 chart on the local radio station CIUT and continues to be played on-air worldwide. Greenberg was named jazz vocalist of the month for October 2010 on the web-based Bob Birch Radio from the United Kingdom.

She plans to tour in 2011 in support of her album.

For more information on Greenberg, visit her website at www.donnagreenberg.com.

Greenberg launches Mav'rik on Feb. 12 at The Annex Live, 296 Brunswick Ave., Toronto. Tickets are $15. For reservations, call 416-929-3999 or visit www.theannex-live.com.

Canadian explores roots of Muslim antisemitism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Tarek Fatah, a frank and fearless Pakistani Canadian Muslim writer and broadcaster, has written an astonishingly courageous and much-needed book.

In The Jew Is Not My Enemy: Unveiling the Myths that Fuel Muslim Anti-Semitism (McClelland & Stewart), he explores the historical, political and theological underpinnings of this pernicious phenomenon and explains why Israel's right to exist cannot be questioned.

Claiming that a virulent form of antisemitism has inundated the Islamic world, Fatah traces its roots to the Hadith, the commentaries written on the Prophet Muhammad's words and deeds after his death. "From labelling Christians and Jews pigs and apes to prohibiting Muslims from playing chess, Hadith literature has been a source of much embarrassment to Muslims," he writes. Anti-Jewish passages in the Hadith, he adds, have been superimposed on the Qur'an, which, though generally respectful of Judaism, contains "some pretty harsh language about Jews."

A legend in which Muhammad supposedly participated in the slaughter of 600 to 900 Jews in Medina in 627 also nourishes antisemitism among Muslims, he contends. "Contemporary Islamists and clerics evoke the story of the slaughter to recruit young Muslim into the hate fest targeted at the Jew," he writes. He adds, "The story of the massacre... feeds our hatred and gives us moral and religious validation for that hate."

He suggests that Islamic fundamentalists such as the Egyptian Sayyid Qutb have exacerbated tensions. In an essay titled "Our Fight Against the Jews," Qutb wrote, "The Jews will be satisfied only with the destruction of [Islam]."

Fatah also has harsh things to say about Mohammed Amin al-Husseini, the Mufti of Jerusalem. After collaborating with Nazi Germany, he persuaded Islamists in postwar Egypt that antisemitism should be an integral component of their worldview.

To Fatah, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the Russian forgery first published in Arabic in 1926 in Jerusalem, firmly established antisemitism in the Muslim consciousness. "However, it was only after the end of World War II, when the rest of the world had dismissed The Protocols as a fake, that the tract found new life in the Middle East," Fatah writes. "Defeat of the combined Arab armies in 1948 at the hands of Israel gave fresh impetus to Judeophobia."

Infected by the virus of antisemitism, a growing number of Islamists and Muslim intellectuals prone to conspiracy theories believe that Jews cannot be trusted and control the world, he says.

And, citing a study by the Hudson Institute's Center for Religious Freedom, he accuses Saudi Arabia of funding the publication of antisemitic "Islamic propaganda."

Fatah, born and raised in Karachi, laments that antisemitism has found widespread acceptance in Pakistan. He singles out the city of Peshawar as a hotbed of Jew-hatred. "If there is a place on earth today where identifying oneself as a Jew means inviting serious danger to life and liberty, then the historic Pakistani city of Peshawar would easily win that honour."

Transformed into a centre of jihadism by Al Qaeda and "Arab Afghans," Peshawar was once home to a prosperous and thriving Jewish community with a synagogue. But now Peshawar is "a place where men are willing to slit the throat of a kuffar [non-believer] and confess to the crime with pride."

Although warning that a discussion of Muslim-Jewish relations becomes a non-starter the moment Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state is challenged, Fatah insists that Israel's "illegal and immoral" occupation of the West Bank has contributed to the rise of blatant antisemitism in Muslim countries.

As he puts it, "Though it is true that many Muslim critics of Israel are motivated by Judeophobia, not all criticism – even the harshest – stems from antisemitism."

Fatah, a supporter of a two-state solution, holds that the Arabs' uncompromising "all-or-nothing" policy was a factor in bringing about the birth of Israel. The Palestinians could have achieved statehood long ago had they accepted the 1937 Peel Commission plan or the 1947 United Nations partition plan, he argues.

'I believe it is fundamentally anti-Jewish to incessantly challenge the moral and ethical basis of Israel as a Jewish state'

Fatah urges Muslims to reconcile themselves to the fact that Israel's establishment was sanctioned by the United Nations' General Assembly by a two-thirds majority. "Questioning Israel's moral and legal right to exist as a state within secure borders that are recognized by its neighbours should cease to be a subject of endless debate," he writes. "I believe it is fundamentally anti-Jewish to incessantly challenge the moral and ethical basis of Israel as a Jewish state."

Fatah's beliefs, and his willingness to state them in public, belies the fact that he was "conflicted" for decades. As a student in Pakistan, he raised funds for the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, and in Toronto, he demonstrated outside the Israeli consulate. "But never once in my entire life have I had even an iota of antisemitism in my soul," he observes.

Fatah's first friendship with a Jew did not occur until 1993, when he met his boss-to-be, Toronto trade unionist Julius Deutsch, who died last year. The son of German Jewish refugees, he imparted to Fatah an understanding of the complexity of the Arab-Israeli conflict. " I learned from this Jew that things are rarely ever black and white, and that the truth is usually found in the grey areas of overlapping narratives."

Fatah believes that the Muslim community's "false sense of victimhood" is counter-productive. "As the rest of the world makes rapid advances in technology, culture, arts, literature and social development, the Muslim world seems frozen in time, obsessed with the past... [and] paralyzed in the quagmire of stagnation."

Though much of his book is laden with gloom, Fatah claims not all is lost. Muslim reformers are gaining ground, and their voices are being heard, he says, citing a list of names.

Whether Fatah is overly optimistic remains to be seen. But if the Middle East is ever to become a better place for Jews and Arabs, let us hope that Fatah is right.

Peace, calm, joy and purpose

As the past year draws to a close, and the new year begins, I am so grateful for so much in our lives, mostly the wonderful people that mean the world to my family and me.

One of those people, Judy G., has mentioned to me a quote from a book that her dad gave her, which she refers to as "code 53." The other day she dropped by with a copy of the book, The Gentle Weapon, Prayers for Everyday and Not-So-Everyday Moments, by Rebbe Nachman of Breslov. It's a collection of prayers that offer an uplifting perspective on life. I turned to page 53, the "code 53." I found the following prayer, called Inner Calm: "Patient God,/ teach me to be patient/ unruffled by those who anger,/ tolerant of those who exasperate,/ accepting of those who disappoint./ Help me remain/ Serene in the face of derision./ Calm in the face of provocation,/ Composed in the midst of a storm./ And, God.../ Teach me to be patient/ With myself."

Rebbe Nachman wrote that "life makes warriors of us all. To emerge the victors, we must arm ourselves with the most potent of weapons. That weapon is prayer." Each prayer begins with praise and thanks, so that the relationship is not just one of requests for what we need and want, but one of giving back.

Life Coach Corner

By Judy Siblin-Librach

Again it comes back to the word "gratitude," and how important it is to stay connected to what we are so grateful for.

Another wonderful way to begin 2011 is to focus on what you want in the new year. In The Power of a Single Thought: How to Initiate Major Life Changes from the Quiet of Your Mind, Gay Hendricks and Debbie De Voe describe how major, positive shifts in the quality of your life can be initiated by changing a single thought. "So if your thoughts are negative, then you'll experience pain; if positive, you'll experience joy." They also write about how "a dour expression on your face doesn't appear by chance; it's the result of unpleasant thoughts. Wrinkles that line your face are drawn by negative thought patterns."

The message is that "there is no greater comfort than benevolence to ease grief and sorrow. If you continually live with thoughts of ill will, cynicism, suspicion and envy, you'll confine yourself to a self-made prison cell. But if each day you think well of all – being cheerful with everyone and patiently learning to find the good in every person and in every moment, you'll experience an abundance of peace."

Peace of mind and inner peace and calm is what I wish for you in 2011. And finally, set a goal for this year and make it your focal point, and ask, what is your life's purpose right now?

Wishing you all a happy, healthy, peaceful and wonderful new year filled with lots of joy, goodness and bliss!

Ottawa-area goalie named to Team Ontario

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Daniel Altshuller straps on the pads as goaltender for the Nepean Raiders, he usually prepares himself to face shooters from Hawkesbury, Kemptville and Pembroke, but on Dec. 29 he stared down an entirely different group of players – guys from the Czech Republic, Slovakia and Western Canada.

Altshuller was recently one of the goaltenders with Team Ontario for the 2011 World Under-17 Hockey Challenge. Five international teams and five Canadian squads competed at the tournament, which ran from Dec. 29 to Jan. 4 in Winnipeg and Portage La Prairie. Joining Ontario were teams from the Pacific region, Western Canada, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, while on the international side, the Czechs and Slovaks were joined by skaters from the United States, Finland and Germany.

Reached at his home in Nepean, a suburb of Ottawa, before the tournament, Altshuller said he was pleased with his selection. "It feels great," the 16-year-old said. "I feel a really great responsibility to the province. I just want to play my best and try to win."

So far this season, in 27 games with the Central Tier 1 Junior A Hockey League (CHL) franchise, Altshuller sports a .916 save percentage and 2.89 goals against average.

He's been particularly hot of late. On Dec. 2, he was named CHL Rookie of the Month for November, after he helped turn around the Raiders' season, moving them from 11th place in the league to a tie for fourth.

Altshullerwent5-2-2 in November with a .913 save percentage and one shutout.

Although not the best stats in the league, it was enough to get the call from Team Ontario organizers. He was only one of two guys on the team who didn't play in the Ontario Hockey League, the major junior circuit that develops many NHL-calibre players.

> 'An opportunity for him to show his stuff'

Altshuller said he was eager to test his skills against international players. He wasn't at all concerned about facing tougher shooters in the tournament. "There are going to be good shooters," he acknowledged, "but I feel since I'm in a league with 20-year-olds, that will prepare me to play against 17-year-olds."

In past years, the tournament showcased elite players who went on to pro careers. Ninety World Under-17 alumni were selected in the 2010 NHL Entry Draft, including 20 in the first round. The top three picks were Taylor Hall, Tyler Seguin and Erik Gudbranson.

Heady company indeed, but his coach believed Altshuller has what it takes to compete with the big boys.

"He's got unlimited potential," said Nepean head coach and general manager Peter Goulet. "The question is how hard he works, how he develops."

As a 16-year-old, "he just has so much poise. He competes, he battles on every shot," Goulet said.

Lots of people who watch the six-foot-three, 195-pound Altshuller player say he reminds them of Habs' netminder Corey Price. "He's very technical, stays square to the shooter and tracks the puck very well," Goulet said. Complementing that is his quickness: "He has great, great reflexes," Goulet added.

Last year, Team Ontario lost to Team USA by a score of 2-1 in the final in Timmins, Ont. The Americans, who play together all year, are again favoured, said Ontario head coach Jake Grimes of the Belleville Bulls.

Grimes told the the Intelligencer of Belleville that he was relying on Altshuller to demonstrate why he was selected for Team Ontario.

"He's having a really good year and has played an absolute ton of hockey with good numbers. Now, here's an opportunity for him to show his stuff," Grimes said.

Like many a Canadian kid, Altshuller started playing hockey at an early age. He was around six when he first joined an organized program and as soon as he could, he played in the net.

Before joining the Raiders, a team owned by his father, Bryan, he played for the Ottawa Jr. 67's and with the major bantam Ottawa Senators. A graduate of the Hillel Academy of Ottawa, Altshuller was drafted by the OHL's Belleville Bulls last year, but opted to play in Nepean.

"I always wanted to be a goalie," Altshuller said. "I always wanted to be the guy everybody depends on and help out the team."

Hall of Fame inducts seven

JTA

LOS ANGELES — A 19th-century bare-knuckles pugilist and a pioneer women's judo champion are among seven elected to the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

Five Americans, one Briton and one Russian will be formally inducted into the Hall of Fame museum on the campus of Israel's Wingate Institute in July 2013 during the quadrennial Maccabiah Games.

Following are the new inductees.

• Samuel Elias, a.k.a "Dutch Sam," "The Terrible Jew" and "Star of the East." He is regarded as the greatest small man in bare-knuckles ring history. He fought in 100 bouts, many lasting 35 to 60 rounds, and lost only once.

• Robert (Bobby) Frankel scored 3,654 victories as a legendary horse trainer until his death in 2009 in Los Angeles. His nearly $228 million (US) in career earnings made him the second winningest trainer in horse racing history.

• Judo pioneer Rena Kanokogi, the former Rusty Glickman of Brooklyn, known as the "mother of women's judo," almost single-handedly forced the Olympic Committee to recognize women's judo. She coached the U.S. team in the 1988 Olympic Games.

• Sports columnist Leonard Koppett wrote for New York's Herald Tribune, Post and Times, besides authoring 16 books.

• Alfred Kuchevsky played a major role as defenceman in the Soviet Union's domination of international ice hockey in the 1950s. He was named three times to the Soviet Hockey League All-Stars.

• Fred Lewis, a three- and four-wall handball champion, was named the 1970s Player of the Decade by the National Handball Association. He now lives in Arizona.

• Billiards champ Michael Sigel, described as the "greatest living player of the 20th century" by the International Pool Tour, is the winner of 10 world titles and six U.S. opens. He now lives in Florida.

Since its founding in 1979, the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame has inducted 350 sports figures from 24 countries.

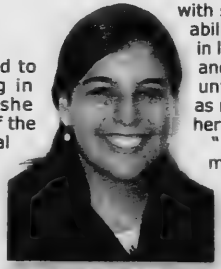
Toronto Aleh volunteer conquers her own challenges

By VICKY TOBINIAH
Special to The CJN

When Rafi Gasner decided to spend a year studying in a seminary in Israel, she thought she would spend most of the time focusing on her own personal growth. Her year has shaped up to be much more about helping others.



Rafi Gasner

Gasner was born and raised in Thornhill, Ont. While attending Ulpanat Orot High School for Girls, she quickly discovered that one of her biggest passions in life is helping others, specifically children with special needs.

She volunteered with Yachad, the National Jewish Council for Disabilities, an organization dedicated to addressing the needs of disabled peoples and including them in the Jewish community.

"My high school promoted volunteer work and especially organizations like Yachad. On the first day that I met with the people at Yachad, I immediately felt a connection to them and I loved what I was doing. It made me want to come back, and I continued volunteering there for four years," Gasner said.

Afterward she volunteered with D.A.N.I. Toronto, an organization founded in 2005 to create opportunities for young adults with disabilities and allow them to have a full and meaningful quality of life.

"I was intrigued with the organization... because they help young adults live a real and full life, just like any other adult. After working mostly with children at Yachad, I wanted to volunteer with D.A.N.I. and help young adults like myself have the same opportunities that I did," Gasner said.

Her desire for helping people with special needs led her to work for Camp HASC in New York for two summers. The organization provides children with special needs the opportunity to attend sleepover camps. "It's really completely different than working with other children. If these kids don't do something, it's not because they don't want to, it's because they can't. I really wanted to help kids grow and overcome some of their obstacles."

After graduating from Ulpanat Orot, Gasner decided to spend a year in a seminary in Israel. Part of her program was committing to one afternoon a week of volunteer work. She chose to volunteer with ALEH, Israel's biggest network of residential facilities for children with severe physical and cognitive disabilities. After one afternoon, she fell in love with the organization, the staff and the kids, and she decided to volunteer there not only once a week, as required by her school, but also on her weekly day off from school.

"It's a very welcoming environment," she said. "On the first day I was there, I noticed all the kids had these beautiful smiles on their faces. It was so amazing to see their genuine smiles."

In the beginning, Gasner had to overcome some challenges herself. She was not fluent in Hebrew, which made it difficult to communicate to the staff and the kids. "The teachers only spoke Hebrew, which was challenging for me, since my Hebrew was not very good. Luckily, the staff was very helpful and helped me communicate with the kids," she said.

"The one thing that really amazes me is that every day is a different, unique experience. Every day these kids have new challenges that they overcome. My job is to help them through these challenges, and help make their lives like any other kids' lives. One day we had a musical therapist come in and we helped the kids dance. Their faces lit up, and you could see they felt valuable."

Gasner knew when she got involved with ALEH that she would be giving back to the community, but she is pleased that the experience has helped her as well.

"I didn't just want to spend a year focusing on myself. I wanted to give back to the community, and in the end, this experience is also helping me grow," she said.

"When you work with special needs children, you develop an appreciation for life. You see how they appreciate the [smallest] things, from being able to hold a ball in their hands to being able to stand up, and it makes you grateful for everything you have," she added.

The staff at ALEH plan activities such as dancing, baking cookies and Shabbat parties. They try to let the kids use their different motilities to do the different activities. "Some kids can move their hands, so we would play a game like bowling. Other kids can't move at all, so we let them touch the textures to their face so they can feel what we are doing," said Gasner.

She hopes to pursue a career in special needs and nursing. "I can't imagine doing anything else. These children don't complain about their obstacles, and they take on their challenges. It helped me learn to deal with my own challenges.

"When I first came to ALEH, my biggest challenge was [the] language barrier. When I saw how these kids deal with bigger problems every day, it helped me overcome my difficulty."

She is thankful the staff at ALEH was so welcoming, and is grateful to have formed relationships with both the teachers and the kids.

"These teachers are 24/7 caretakers. The kids have constant love and care from people who they are not related to. They develop a connection to us, and this bond is so rewarding."

The whole truth

Dear Ella,

A close friend of mine just bought new furniture. She was very excited when she called and invited me over to see it and give my opinion.

I didn't think anything of it, as Deb and I go way back and we always consult each other on many issues.

When I got there, I realized she wasn't kidding. She bought new living, dining and bedroom furniture. She practically redid her whole house!

We did a walkthrough, and she asked me straight out what I thought about each and every piece. I have always been honest with her, as she has with me, and I didn't feel this situation was any different. However, when I told her I didn't like her dining room set, she informed me she had bought all the furniture at a bankruptcy sale and it's non-refundable. She was quite hurt and upset that I didn't like the dining room. I tried to backtrack, but the damage was done. Was I wrong to give her my honest opinion?

Whole Truth and Nothing But

Dear Whole Truth and Nothing But,

You walked into a trap. Your friend didn't want your opinion on her new furniture, she wanted to share her excitement with you.

She wanted you to tell her everything was gorgeous, that she has great taste, that she got a fabulous deal. Even without Deb realizing it, all she really wanted was your validation – she was just too excited to think it through, and never expected a negative response.

You can't take back what you've already said, but you can learn from this experience. A truthful opinion can backfire when nothing can be done about the final outcome.

If Deb got a terrible haircut, should you say, "It looks awful, but don't worry. It will grow back"?

Before you answer the question "What do you think of my new [anything]?" you need to get some facts. Whether it's as small as a new dress or as large as a new house, get the whole story before you offer your opinion. If the purchase is final, would admitting that you disapprove help in any way? Did telling her you didn't like her furniture accomplish anything other than hurting her feelings?

You don't have to come out and lie, but choose your words carefully. You might say something like: "You got a fabulous deal," or "The furniture fits perfectly in here," or even "It's not exactly my taste, but it's a beautiful set".

Telling the truth is important, but not necessarily when the situation is a fait accompli. If there's nothing to be gained by offering a negative opinion, why do it? Don't dwell on this incident. What's done is done. Your relationship with Deb will survive. You have learned something from this experience. Once in awhile, when the opportunity is appropriate, skirting the truth may be the gracious thing to do.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

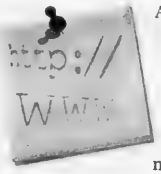
The CJN's French-language reporter in Montreal, Elias Levy, writes about:

• Israeli economist Jacques Bendelac talks about the allocation of government funds to different groups in Israel.



• A panel recently discussed the topic of Jewish schools and the secularization of Quebec, as part of a conference for the 150th anniversary of the Alliance Israélite Universelle.

• For the first time in its 50-year history, Congregation Dorshei Emet, Montreal's only Reconstructionist synagogue, has hired an "official second clergy." She is assisting Rabbi Ron Aigen, spiritual leader since 1976 of the 500-family member congregation, with particular duties leading b'nei mitzvah education and programming for youth and families. Unlike many Montreal synagogues, Dorshei Emet has grown over the past decade.

It's difficult to let go

I recently was asked to attend an ethics workshop at a Tel Aviv teaching hospital where I knew many of the staff. Since my Hebrew is just adequate, I at times answered them in a mixture of Hebrew and English.

The discussion was about a conflict between a distraught family receiving "bad news" and their attempt to change the course of nature by making demands that were clinically unreasonable. The ambient level of emotion was extreme and made communication a challenge.

An elderly woman who had lived alone and apparently functioned well was admitted to a geriatric rehabilitation program following a stroke. The goal was to bring her to a level of function to enable her to return home to the care of her son and daughter.

Initially, she seemed to improve, and the family and staff were pleased with her progress. But she then deteriorated, with symptoms not characteristic of a stroke, including loss of appetite, weight loss, fatigue and anemia.

Investigations eventually revealed that she had an underlying cancer of the pancreas, which had spread extensively throughout her abdomen and had reached a point where no treatment options were considered beneficial.

Senior Side of Life

By Michael Gordon

The children, especially the daughter, approached the staff with an initial skepticism and then a degree of concern that became coupled with an intensity bordering on hostility. The daughter had difficulty grasping that her mother, who seemed to be suffering only from the stroke from which she was making progress, could develop a terminal disease while under the care of physicians. The son, who did not have the most amicable relationship with his sister, gradually understood what had happened, but deferred to his sister to interact with staff because of the emotional toll her assertive approach was taking on him.

During the hospitalization, as discussed at the workshop, the responsible physician received incessant calls from the daughter for progress reports and demands for interventions that were untenable, such as transfer to the intensive care unit.

Some staff members suggested taking a hard line, including calling security when she became belligerent. The discussion explored why she was responding as she was, and then considered strategies for dealing with her state of denial, which although extreme, could be understood.

The responsible physician adopted a combination of non-emotionally reactive support, attempts at responding to even marginal requests (such as for a formal intensive care consultation) and engaging the brother in providing support to his sister. Eventually, she accepted the reality of her mother's situation, no longer sought "miracles" and ceased her conflicts with the staff. I later heard that she ultimately thanked the staff for their exemplary care.

Dealing with bad news anywhere is always a challenge. Those practising medicine and its allied professions have the duty to help distraught families understand and accept the bad outcomes that do occur.

Anti-Israel shoe store boycott a PR failure

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The anti-Israel boycott campaign has suffered a major setback in Quebec because it targeted a small family business and especially because of the intervention of Québec solidaire MNA Amir Khadir, the Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) believes.

The organization's research and communications director, David Ouellette, describes as unprecedented the repudiation in the French media of the campaign to convince the public not to buy Israeli products as a result of the singling out of the Boutique Le Marcheur on St. Denis Street.

The coverage has cast in a negative light both the campaign's methods and the propriety of an elected official picketing a local store because it sells a line of shoes from Israel that comprises a small percentage of its inventory.

Ouellette has collected a thick dossier of newspaper, television, radio and online material to support that conclusion. Although unions and other broad-based organizations such as the Federation des femmes du Québec have officially endorsed the boycott of Israel in the past few years, the QIC maintains that the issue continues to garner "marginal" support from the Quebec public.

The appearance that the participation of Khadir – who, according to a recent poll, is the most popular politician in the province – has harmed the boycotters' cause rather than helped it only bolsters that conclusion, Ouellette said.

"The media coverage aroused a wave of moral indignation," Ouellette said. "There is no public support for BDS in Quebec. Quebecers don't buy the 'apartheid' label."

On Dec. 18, about 150 people, mostly francophones, journalists and other opinion-makers among them, swamped Le Marcheur while the picketing outside was in progress. It was the first organized anti-boycott action by non-Jews in Quebec, he said.

Commentators have questioned why Khadir seems concerned only with the human-rights record of one state and not more egregious violators, and they've rejected the contention that Israel can be compared to South Africa's former apartheid regime.

DEFENCE MINISTERS MEET

Defence Minister Ehud Barak expressed solidarity with Canada when he met in Tel Aviv with his Canadian counterpart, Peter MacKay, on Monday, saying Canada and MacKay are friends of Israel. Barak, who spoke on a panel on homeland security at the three-day Halifax International Security Forum in November, praised MacKay's involvement in helping organize the forum.

Kent Promoted

TORONTO — Thornhill MP Peter Kent was promoted to environment minister in a minor cabinet shuffle last week. Kent, a former news broadcaster who represents the riding with the highest proportion of Jewish voters in the country, had been serving as minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas). He was first elected in 2008, defeating Liberal Susan Kadis.

Assad Meeting

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-president of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, met with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus. Hoenlein said Jan. 3 that the meeting late last month was at the invitation of Syria and not, as reported by the Israeli media, at the behest of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. "All I can say is that I did not go as a negotiator or mediator or with messages," Hoenlein told JTA. "I addressed humanitarian concerns." He wouldn't elaborate except to say the trip involved restoration of shuls and was "for the good of the Jewish people."

Mickey in Haifa?

HAIFA — Haifa will be the next home to a Disney amusement park. A 20-acre, $168-million complex, including a 25-screen multiplex and an amusement park, is set to be built near the Carmel Tunnel. The Walt Disney Company's investment arm, Shamrock Holdings, and Israel's New Lineo cinema chain announced the plans Jan. 4. The complex is slated to open in 2013.

Letters For Pollard

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu wrote U.S. President Barack Obama urging clemency for convicted spy Jonathan Pollard. Netanyahu read his letter Jan. 4 to a Knesset plenum discussion. His letter, Israel's first formal request for Pollard's release, came a day after similar urgings from more than 500 clergy – including rabbis representing all streams, as well as a number of leading Protestant and Roman Catholic clergy – in a letter to Obama. The letters are the latest in a surge of pleas to free Pollard, a U.S. Navy analyst who spied for Israel and who has been in prison since 1985.

Cuts At Book Centre

BOSTON — The National Yiddish Book Center, amid a change in focus, laid off four employees and closed its bookstore. The Amherst, Mass., centre made the layoffs last month as part of a strategic change from saving and restoring Yiddish texts to educating people about them. The cuts include the director's assistant, a gifts officer, the bookstore manager and a designer of the centre's magazine. The vice-president and program director also resigned, leaving the centre with 16 workers. The centre, open since 1980, has collected more than one million Yiddish volumes.

Group Mulls Thomas Award Name Change

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Helen Thomas' decision to take her disparagement of Zionists from off the cuff (last May) to on the record (last month) has led a journalists' group to consider dropping her name from a lifetime achievement award.

The Society of Professional Journalists is revisiting its decision last summer not to change the name of its Helen Thomas Lifetime Achievement Award after Thomas, 90, told an Arab-American group in Dearborn, Mich., last month that Congress, the White House, Hollywood and Wall Street "are owned by the Zionists."

Thomas, a 67-year-veteran of Washington reporting, resigned from her job as a columnist at Hearst last June after remarking to a video blogger that Jews "should get the hell out of Palestine" and "go home" to Poland, Germany and the United States. She later apologized, but her remarks in Michigan on Dec. 2 have raised fresh concerns about the sincerity of the apology.

Wayne State University, her alma mater, withdrew its Helen Thomas Spirit of Diversity in the Media Award after her most recent remarks. Under deluge again, the Society for Professional Journalists said it would reconsider. Thomas, born to Lebanese immigrants, for decades was the White House correspondent for United Press International.

Palestinian doctor hopes 'wisdom will prevail'

Peace advocate launches lawsuit following death of family in Gaza Strip conflict

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A local Palestinian physician and Middle East peace advocate whose three daughters and niece were killed by Israeli forces during the war in the Gaza Strip two years ago is confident that Israel will ultimately issue an apology and provide compensation for his losses.

"I'm positive wisdom will prevail," said Dr. Izzeldin Abuelaish, who immigrated to Canada after the tragedy and is now the Michael and Amira Dan Professor in Global Health at the University of Toronto. "I'm asking for the truth and fighting for justice. Israel needs to take responsibility."

Abuelaish – an ardent advocate of a two-state solution and a proponent of non-violence to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict – filed a lawsuit against the Israeli government late last month after Israel announced he was not entitled to an apology and compensation.

"They left me without an alternative," Abuelaish said in an interview last week in his office at the Dalla Lana School of Public Health. "I tried to settle the matter through mediators, but it didn't work."

Among the mediators were Avishay Braverman, the current minister of minorities and a former president of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, and Amir Peretz, the former minister of defence, both of whom are members of the Labor party.

In spite their efforts, Israel's Ministry of Defence said it would neither apologize nor compensate him.

The ministry's legal adviser, Ahaz Ben-Ari, was quoted by Ynetnews.com as saying that a settlement would not be forthcoming: "Despite the severe outcome, from a legal standpoint our stance is that the operation during which Dr. Abuelaish's family members were hurt was an operation of war. Therefore, the State of Israel does not carry the responsibility for the damage it caused."

Israel's embassy in Ottawa was asked for a comment, but its press attache could not provide one because of a labour dispute at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

A never-ending story

From the editor's desk...

"We are requesting from the nations... to accept the state of Palestine of '67 – that's what we're trying to achieve," chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat told reporters last week. (Please see the editorial in this week's edition.)

Of course, the canny Erekat neglected to tell his audience that there was no state of Palestine of '67.

This happens to be one of the many inconvenient truths about the Arab-Israeli conflict that Palestinian and other leaders always neglect to share with an eager, peace-seeking public.

Gaza – which Israel unilaterally left some five years ago and which is now entirely governed by Palestinians (Hamas) – was under Egyptian rule in 1967. In 1967, there was not the slightest prospect that the Egyptians would relinquish control of the Gaza Strip to its local Palestinian inhabitants. It just simply was not in Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's plans.

The West Bank, including east Jerusalem and the Old City, was under Jordanian rule in 1967. The British-trained army of the Hashemite Kingdom of Transjordan (as Jordan was then called) remained in the West Bank at the conclusion of Israel's War of Independence, 1948-1949, thereby staking a Jordanian claim to sovereignty over the area. Nor was there ever any intention in 1967 on the part of the Jordanian king to relinquish control of the West Bank and east Jerusalem to the local Palestinians. Indeed, the Hashemite family had always considered itself as history's rightful custodians of Jerusalem's holy Muslim places. It was only many years later that King Hussein "abdicated" his custodial responsibilities for Jerusalem when he understood, pointedly, that clinging to the custodial role endangered the stability of his kingdom more than it ennobled it.

Thus, when Erekat refers to "the state of Palestine of '67" it is, like so much of what he says: cynical fiction.

Palestine did not exist in 1967.

The Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), whose most celebrated leader was Yasser Arafat, was created in 1964 fully three years before the Six Day War of 1967. The first leader of the PLO was Lebanese-born Ahmed Shukairy. He was appointed to the job by the Arab League. In 1964, the PLO was trying to liberate "Palestine," – excluding, of course, Gaza and the West Bank, which were already under Arab rule – from the Jews, who, 16 years earlier, to the painful chagrin of the Arabs, had refused to be thrown into the sea. At no time during the 18 years between 1949 and 1967 did Egypt, Jordan or the Arab League establish or even discuss establishing an independent state of Palestine in Gaza and the West Bank.

I know that looking back to the factual, historical context of the conflict is only of limited use, if even that. There is an irrefutable reality today that must be accommodated. Some two million Palestinians live in the West Bank today. They do not wish to be ruled by Israel. Nor does Israel wish to rule them.

Pragmatics must trump principle if a reasonable, workable solution is to be found, finally, to the conflict. Pragmatism offers the most hope for a negotiated end to this longstanding dispute.

Still, we dare not disregard the truth of history or surrender the entitlement of the Jews, too, to seek justice and fairness from the other side. We must protect the truth of history.

The young generations of Jews must know this (their) history. They must know that the cause of a sovereign, independent Jewish state in the Middle East is a just one.

The world must be reminded of this history.

And the Palestinians must be held to account when they purposefully, deliberately distort history.

The allusion to a state of Palestine of '67 is but the latest in a never-ending story of prevarication by Palestinian leaders.

The Palestinian leadership still denies any Jewish connection to the Western Wall.

Last week, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas condemned the death of Jawaher Abu Rahmah as a "new Israeli crime carried out by the occupation army against our helpless nation." Abbas alleged that Rahmah was killed by exposure to tear gas fired by the Israel Defence Forces at the weekly anti-Israel protest against the security barrier in the West Bank village of Bil'in. The IDF's commander in the West Bank, however, Brig.-Gen. Nitzan Alon, refuted Abbas' claim. Alon said she died of various medical complications. "She most probably died as a result of other complications, combined with problems in the medical care she received at the Palestinian hospital," Alon said.

The sad truth is that most of the world accepts uncritically the Palestinian narrative. This has unpleasant consequences for Israel and its supporters. But one of those consequences must never be our acquiescence to the falsification of history.

We have too much reverence for truth.

BIRTHRIGHT GATHERING

Young Jews from all over the world, in Israel on the Taglit-Birthright program, assembled last week at the International Conference Center in Jerusalem for a special rally. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told the group that his government would double its annual budget for the program, which brings about 30,000 young adults from the ages of 18 to 26 to Israel each year.

SOLE POWER, MAGEN BOYS and G EVENTS create the ULTIMATE TRADE SHOW EXPERIENCE with SHOWTIME!

This past October, MAGEN BOYS ENTERTAINMENT joined forces with SOLE POWER PRODUCTIONS and G EVENTS to create SHOWTIME. A Special Events and Party Expo. The idea, originally conceived by Jian Magen and Gloria Benaim, was to create a Trade Show unlike any of the others that have previously existed.

Once created, the SHOWTIME team planned, produced and executed a sold-out show that was truly unique. "We had the luxury of joining forces with these other teams and put many collective minds together to accomplish this task. We had over twenty staff working on this event, and I think it showed in the final outcome. We were very pleased. ...and there's more to come from us," says Page Magen (co-founder of MBE).

He is referring to SHOWTIME V2, the upcoming Trade Show at the WAREHOUSE on February 9, 2011. The second edition in what Abby Tobias (President of SOLE POWER PRODUCTIONS) calls "the second of many! We knew we were creating something special while we were doing it but to see the event run as it did, and to get the response that we have–that's when we really knew. We sat down the day after the show and began plans for what we think will be an even more spectacular evening on February 9th."

As I walked the SHOWTIME floor, it was apparent to me that this Trade Show was different from the norm. The room was designed to look like an actual party, filled with décor, lighting, video screens, and other things you would typically see at an event. Conceptually, the night included live interviews for various vendors that were broadcasted on monitors and projection units throughout the building. There were event hosts, chaperones and prizes for kids that included IPods and Justin Beiber concert tickets.

Gloria Benaim (G EVENTS) says: "We continue to try and push the envelope in terms of what we can offer the clients and industry personnel. But our main goal was two-fold. One, to fill the room with potential clients, thus keeping our vendors happy and two, to make sure we had a good mix of both new and existing vendors –the top service providers in our industry! We believe that in order for SHOWTIME to be successful, both the vendors and prospective clients need to be satisfied. If we can continue to accomplish that, SHOWTIME V2 at the Warehouse will be an even greater success."

The group promises to offer the same great event with even more unique elements and surprises that will satisfy all who witness it. "We have a few exciting tricks up our sleeve," says Jian Magen (co-founder of MBE). "We know what this game has been missing and creatively, we are here to give the people what they want. The next three SHOWTIME Expos are already in sight—it is like a chess game for us, and we're always thinking a few steps ahead. This show will be bigger and better than the last. We are excited to be at the WAREHOUSE, a great new venue. We are not only implementing our own ideas, but those of our clients and vendors as well. It's important to give the clients and vendors what they request. This show isn't about us, it's all about them!"

With a winning attitude like that, how could SHOWTIME V2 not be a success? I look forward to seeing you all there at the Warehouse (2-35 Carl Hall Rd at Downsview Park) on February 9th, 2011. For more information and updates, check out www.showtimeexpo.ca or call 416.663.7653.

Toronto man heads Reconstructionist group

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto labour lawyer Michael Mitchell is, to the best of his knowledge, the first Canadian president of the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation (JRF). His first official – and unquestionably memorable – duty was a trip to the White House last month for U.S. President Barack Obama's Chanukah party.

"From a Jewish perspective, it was very exciting and interesting to stand in the East Room of the White House with 400 or so Jewish people, and the president of the United States and his wife, and sing the brachot," Mitchell said.

"It was a pretty unique Jewish experience. The thing that impressed me was the extent to which it symbolized the inclusion of Jews in American society.

"I wouldn't say we should be special, but it felt very good to see how Jews were included... I'd want it for all communities. I wouldn't want the Jewish community to be the only one."

A Winnipeg native who received his law degree from the University of Toronto in 1977, Mitchell grew up in a modern Orthodox/Conservative synagogue environment (his family belonged to two shuls) and attended a modern Orthodox day school, as well as Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate through Grade 10.

In Toronto, Mitchell came to Reconstructionism – a movement founded in the last century by Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan – because it offered a place where he and his wife could both be comfortable, he said.

Toronto's Congregation Darchei Noam, where Mitchell sometimes leads services, is one of only three Reconstructionist congregations in Canada. The other two are in Ottawa and Montreal. The JRF represents more than 100 congregations and chavurot in North America.

A former president of Darchei Noam, Mitchell said it had "a strong traditional bent" that he was comfortable with, but it was also completely egalitarian, which appealed to his wife, Lynne.

Michael Mitchell

However, people are more familiar with Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Judaism, he noted. "In Canada in particular, people wonder if [Reconstructionism] is really Jewish, and really authentic – and of course it's very Jewish and very authentic."

A marketing initiative that is in the works to increase awareness is one of his top priorities in his new role.

He's also involved in talks about the possibility of merging the movement's institutions, including the JRF and the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in Philadelphia, to create "a more cohesive and effective organization."

Mitchell said that Reconstructionism answers the "need for Judaism to change and keep modern, evolve and yet have very strong respect for tradition without being bound by it."

The great betrayers

In the spring of 2002, Palestinian Authority spokesperson Saeb Erekat told world media that the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) had conducted a "massacre" in Jenin in which hundreds of Palestinians had been murdered. The alleged event occurred during a military operation to root out terrorists and their confederates after a seder night atrocity in a Netanya hotel in which 29 civilians were slaughtered.

It was quite inconvenient for Erekat, however, that even the United Nations contradicted him. There was no massacre, a special UN report concluded. There was, to be sure, very difficult, close range, hand-to-hand fighting in the clustered warren of houses in Jenin. But there was absolutely and categorically no massacre.

The UN report merely confirmed what most of the diplomatic and media world already knew about Erekat then and always: he travels very little with the truth.

Last week Erekat once again declaimed his prevaricating postures.

"We don't need negotiations anymore," he said when asked about the stalled peace talks with Israel. In place of negotiating with Israel, he put forward a three-point plan to foist upon Israel. Erekat's plan calls for:

- the leaders of the Quartet (the United States, Russia, the European Union and the UN) to make the decisions about the details of peace.
- the UN Security Council to pass a resolution seeking a freeze of Israeli construction on the West Bank "so we can continue the negotiations."
- a statement "from the nations... to accept the state of Palestine of '67."

It is clear that Erekat's and the PA's strategy is to ratchet up the level of international frustration with the peace process – that is, with Israel – by using any and every pretext to permanently stymie bilateral negotiations. The phony call for a settlement freeze, alas, still seems to have a great deal of traction. The PA is convinced, rightly so, that the mounting frustration will translate into diplomatic steps favouring the Palestinians.

Israeli government spokesperson Mark Regev asked the most compellingly obvious and appropriate question last week in an interview with BBC Radio. "How do you expect to make peace with Israel unless you're willing to talk to Israel?"

There will never be peace between Israel and the Palestinians without a mutually agreeable, negotiated treaty. And there will never be a negotiated agreement without, dare we say it, negotiations. By avoiding negotiations, Erekat and the PA leadership are yet again forestalling the possibility of peace.

This has been the constant betrayal of Palestinian history. And the Arafats, the Erekats, the Abbases and all those before them who have shunned negotiations with Israel have been the great betrayers of the Palestinian people.

Israel had its best tourism year ever in 1985, with a record 1.43 million visitors, a 15 per cent increase over the previous year, tourism minister Avraham Sharir announced. He forecast a five to eight per cent rise for 1986 and predicted two million visitors within two to three years.

The Peto thesis

In The Victimhood of the Powerful: White Jews, Zionism and the Racism of Hegemonic Holocaust Education, Jennifer Peto writes: "I propose that these claims to victimhood are no longer based in a reality of oppression, but continue to be propagated because a victimized Jewish identity can produce certain effects that are beneficial to the organized Jewish community"("U of T's standards questioned in approving thesis," Dec. 16).

Peto did not seem to get the answers she needed from her Jewish education: she got emotion and victimhood instead. She did not get facts. She did not absorb the history, the chronological development of the Holocaust and its geopolitical, economic, psychological, legal, and social context within the wider war. Rather than presenting the facts, the emotional approach is what some Jewish educators give to our history and what can be learned from it. For them, it is easier to teach fear and victimization, which can be used to keep students "in the fold."

Are our Jewish schools teaching what happened during the Holocaust, and how this history can be used to study the depths – and heights – that human beings can achieve during times of extreme trauma and stress? Between 1939 and 1945, 1-1/2 million Jews served in the Allied forces, among them, 16,883 Canadian Jews. Jews under German occupation resisted with every means available to them and maintained a level of dignity, humanity and spirituality of which we should all be proud. Victimhood distorts this story.

Are our Jewish schools teaching what historical, institutional antisemitism was like? How was it different from antisemitism today, how is it now expressed, and what place do Jews hold today in western society? Peto has a point: there is another way to teach our traumatic history and uneasy present than with the bludgeon of victimhood. The Shoah is not an excuse to view Jews as victims, and not an opportunity for us to lay blame and claim entitlement. Rather it is a way to study human potential, and must be transmitted as such. As Peto sees herself as the product of a "privileged" Jewish education, we have failed her. And she is not alone.

Sheldon Kirshner's views are at odds with the other columnists in The CJN ("Peace is as elusive and distant as ever," Jan. 6). Gerald Steinberg explains how and why the Palestinian refugee "industry" is thriving, thanks to its anti-peace mythology, in "Freezing Palestinian myths" (Jan. 6). Paul Michaels reminds us that time and again, it's the Palestinians who have rejected the compromises necessary for peace in "Are Palestinians ready for a two-state solution?" (Jan. 6).

Kirshner, despite all the evidence, continues to blame Israel, and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman in particular. Kirshner complains that Netanyahu never "seriously courted" Kadima party leader Tzipi Livni as a coalition partner, even though Netanyahu took weeks to establish his coalition for the very reason that he was trying to find a solution that would include the Kadima party. Kirshner could well ask himself why Netanyahu was able to reach an agreement with Defence Minister Ehud Barak's Labor party, which is to the left of Kadima, but not with Livni and her supposedly centrist party.

Kirshner also tells us that Washington concluded it "was not worth the trouble" to give Israel a written summary of the package of "extremely generous U.S. incentives in return for prolonging the [settlement] freeze." Yet Israel did not turn down the package. Netanyahu simply asked for it to be confirmed in writing, which the United States suddenly found itself unable to do. Kirshner completely misunderstands what is happening in the Middle East.

I just opened up my CJN and was surprised to see the new and most definitely improved appearance, which was nice. I love the larger font, which eases the burden on a middle-aged woman's eyes. The clean, crisp appearance is delightful. Nice touch.

It's no longer just about the master's thesis

A few months ago, Jennifer Peto, a graduate student at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education at the University of Toronto wrote a rather sloppy master's thesis. Two professors looked it over and signed off, considering it satisfactory.

While this is not a routine practice amidst the typically high standards at the University of Toronto, there is nothing extraordinary in the entire event. Both good and bad master's theses are written and defended every day. Their authors are lucky if they can get their roommates to read them.

Most definitely, master theses do not make the news, do not bother politicians and do not reach the general public.

By Anna Sternshis

Why is the case of Jennifer Peto different? Why does her thesis provoke a heated public discussion about university academic standards? Why might her work come up as the first hit on Google search "Master's Thesis University of Toronto"? Why does it get discussed by Canadian legislators and covered in the mainstream Canadian media? Why does she become famous overnight?

The answer is simple. She writes that white Ashkenazi Jews are racists and manipulators who pretend to be victims by exploiting the memory of the Holocaust through a system of school education and public outreach.

Jewish community organizations are outraged. They send fiery press releases to media outlets. Community leaders and the Jewish public are angry at the university. The defence of the thesis signifies to them that the university agrees with the assertions of the student. They want the student, her supervisor and the supervisors of the supervisor to be punished.

Within the university, many public and private inquiries are made. Faculty members are talking about the thesis, the governing bodies conduct internal investigations and questions are raised about academic standards. However, both the faculty members and the administration of the university know that the media outrage is not about the academic quality of the work, which the public cannot judge. Thus, it becomes an issue of opinion.

Free expression of opinions is a guarded and much fought for academic freedom. For this reason, the university administrators need to defend the student. They have no choice, because next, the community will be allowed to protest and win any questionable argument made in any dissertation in the fields of humanities and social sciences. That's why Prof. Cheryl Misak, a celebrated scholar herself and the provost of the University of Toronto, has to go on record protecting the sloppy work of a random graduate student.

The mainstream press is delighted to cover the story, but not because journalists or the public are interested in the latest achievements in the field of Holocaust education. Rather, the situation makes the news because the thesis argues for the existence of a Jewish conspiracy designed to manipulate an unsuspecting public.

The outrage of Jewish organizations and lobbyists only seems to confirm the theory. The journalists are curious. Maybe there is more to the story than a bad master's thesis? Maybe the outrage suggests that the student is on to something? Maybe, indeed, Jews are angry because they are exposed? Though no one wants to admit it, the idea of Jews hiding something is tantalizing and it helps to sell newspapers.

This situation – the argument and the reaction of community leaders and the public, Jewish and non-Jewish alike – is not unique. In the early 20th century, when the Protocols of the Elders of Zion was first published in St. Petersburg, Russia, in 1903 and then in Detroit in 1920, it provoked a similar reaction. Presented as a transcript of a secret meeting, the Protocols outlined a Jewish master plan of conquering the world, which included manipulating the global economy, educational system and civil rights movement. The authors warned the readers that Jews masked their power by attracting attention to their victimhood. The Protocols alleged that Jews organized anti-Jewish pogroms in order to gain sympathy. Jewish and non-Jewish intellectuals alike spoke out against the ridiculously improbable assumptions of the document; historians asserted that it was a work of fiction; Jewish organizations worldwide were outraged. The polemic lasted for years and the press covered the debate because the public was curious.

While Peto's thesis is certainly no Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the reaction that it provokes from the press and the public is similar. Perhaps a history lesson is in order.

Should the people who are outraged with the thesis understand that their attention to Peto's work actually validates and dignifies it? The wisdom that every kindergartener is taught – "ignoring the offender is the best response to verbal abuse" – would certainly be a better reaction than the current scandal. But quite the opposite is taking place. The journalists, led by the community leaders, create unprecedented publicity for Peto, thus granting her a place, however extreme, in the current spectrum of opinions about the role that Jews play in modern society.

Validating such an extreme opinion is dangerous. It creates the wrong spectrum and, most importantly, the wrong middle ground, the golden mean, toward which most human beings tend to gravitate. The most contemporary illustration of this danger is the political climate in modern Russia. After the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991, post-Soviet public opinion began to reject most postulates previously associated with Soviet ideology, including the value of interethnic tolerance, known to Soviet citizens as "the friendship of peoples." The newly organized ultra-nationalist political parties advocated slightly theoretical, almost academic ideas advocating that Russia belonging solely to Russians.

Home to over 100 ethnic and religious groups, the post-Soviet space soon became a forum of vitriolic debates on the meaning of "true Russian identity." The discussion occupied a central place in Russian politics in the 2000s, when millions of impoverished residents from many former Soviet republics arrived in Russian cities in search of income. Construction workers, street cleaners, nannies and taxi drivers from Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, Moldova and Azerbaijan filled the niche of the fast-growing oil-driven economy of the Russian megalopolises, especially Moscow and St. Petersburg.

This is when the Russian ultra-nationalist parties took their ideas to a new level. Their leaders began to call for violence against migrant workers. They argued that the ethnic diasporas of guest workers were taking advantage of native Russians by stealing their jobs, colonizing their cities and even destroying their culture (this is despite the fact that almost all migrants were from former Soviet republics and spoke Russian fluently).

Similarly to the authors of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the nationalist parties claimed that the migrants, or as they are called in Russian "guest workers," belonged to tightly knit webs of ethnic diasporas that conspired to enslave Russians. Despite the absurdity of these assertions, such views became a valid, albeit extreme part of the Russian political spectrum. As a result, a striking 85,000 Russian citizens openly declared membership in neo-Nazi parties in Russia in 2008, according to Amnesty International. It's not surprising that more than 1,000 migrant workers were attacked, injured or killed as a result of racial crimes between 2003 and 2009.

On the other end of the Russian political spectrum are the political movements that advocate equal rights for migrants and Russian citizens, call for the elimination of racial profiling and for promotion of multiculturalism and tolerance. The number of supporters of these parties is growing, but it is nowhere near the ranks of neo-Nazis, to say nothing of the less radical but still nationalist Russian parties.

What does it mean for the "golden middle" of the political spectrum? In 2008, the Moscow branch of the Human Rights Bureau reported that over 50 per cent of Russians shared a degree of xenophobia and other racist expressions. In other words, contemporary Russians are negotiating between the views of skinheads and supporters of multiculturalism, leaning toward a middle ground where some tolerance is accepted, but only at the price of a significant degree of racism.

Conspiracies, no matter how ridiculous, captivate human minds everywhere. Peto's thesis is certainly not strong enough to change public opinion in Canada as the nationalist parties did in Russia. It is not even strong enough to start a juicy conspiracy. However, the debate that it has provoked is a warning sign of the potential popularity of anti-semitic and other racist political platforms. This is a real cause for alarm.

The community should analyze this danger and work out the strategies for dealing with it, rather than obsess about the weak academic opus that would have been better off had it never left the ivory tower of academia.

Anna Shternshis, PhD, is the Al and Malka Green Associate Professor in Yiddish Studies, department of Germanic languages and literatures, Centre for Diaspora and Transnational Studies and Centre for Jewish Studies, University of Toronto.

The author cites The Protocols of the Elders of Zion as having provided a warning sign of the potential popularity of antisemetic and other racist political platforms.

A promising new initiative

In the weekly Torah cycle, we have begun to read the Book of Shmot, which contains the foundational story of the Jewish People, the Exodus and the receiving of Torah at Sinai. It also slyly indicates an important truth: you can't do it alone.

Who are the persons vital to the survival of Moses and the continued existence of the Israelites in Egypt? Pharaoh's daughter and the midwives Shifrah and Puah. The midwives, according to some midrashim were non-Israelites, but rather righteous Egyptians and not Hebrews. As midwives to the Hebrew women, they saved the male children. Further, who saved Moses on the road back to Egypt? His non-Israelite wife, Zipporah.

Later, who counsels Moses as he grapples with judging Israelite matters? Yitro, his father-in-law, a non-Israelite, one after whom a parshah is actually named!

So what's the kesher, the connection?

It's this: you cannot survive alone. You need others, some of whom may be surprising saviours in time of desperate need. Without Pharaoh's daughter, Moses would have died in the Nile. Without the midwives, male Israelites would have met a similar fate. Without Zipporah, Moses might have been struck down.

We have been so afraid of losing our Jewish selves in the easily accessible Canadian culture of the 21st century that we have ignored the weakening of amity within our own community. We face many threats to Jewish continuance, none more serious than the widening gaps between groups within the Jewish People.

Lesson learned: if we don't hang together, we will all hang separately.

Modern Orthodox Jews fear that their ability to live a halachic life at the same time as a life integrated into Canadian wider society will look too "modern" for the right-wing of Orthodox Judaism. Conservative Jews feel looked down on by the Orthodox. Reform, now the regnant denomination in the United States, sniff at both.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Hence the need for an approach that will bring the best of all to a common room, where together we can exchange ideas, study text and debate issues that divide.

Therefore, it is with guarded optimism that I welcome the announcement of the Canadian Yeshiva and Rabbinical School headed by Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, to open in 2012. To hear that Rabbi Daniel Sperber has agreed to be its chancellor is even better news.

Rabbi Sperber – recipient of the 1992 Israel Prize in recognition of his immense knowledge of Halachah and his unique approach to the study of Judaism (dare I say in an historical context?) – should be a beacon to other Orthodox scholars to let wider trends inform their scholarship. That Rabbi Sperber has been criticized by his peers for participating in this Canadian initiative illustrates my point.

This yeshiva can be the example for others to follow.

There are many issues that probably will not appear immediately on its agenda: the ordination of women (half the Jewish population, remember), or of gays and lesbians. Reform and Conservative denominations have recently grappled with the issues of women, gays and lesbians wanting into the rabbinic fold. Their decisions have caused dissension and resulted in congregations and rabbis breaking away.

Rabbi Tanenbaum's own former synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation of Toronto, withdrew from the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism over some of these issues.

Orthodox Judaism has yet to enter the debate.

However, that both Orthodox and Conservative scholars will teach at this new institution is a significant start. No doubt the Orthodox community will not be united in its praise, and Conservative scholars who participate may come with definite ideas regarding those issues I cited above.

All beginnings are hard. If this yeshiva can be open to all currents of thought in every denomination, it could, as Rabbi Sperber is quoted as saying, " have enormous benefits [including] much wider implications, because it may form a model that can be replicated elsewhere."

Yes, we need each other. As the events of Shmot are there to teach us, we need each other in order to survive and flourish as a living religion. A yeshiva where all voices are heard for the greater good of Judaism must work if we are not all to hang separately.

A light unto the nations?

How can we be a light unto the nations if we are racist?

How can we claim to be "chosen" to bring the word of HaShem into this world if we distance ourselves from the people of this world?

How can we show them the goodly and Godly ways of the Torah if we refuse to interact with them?

The recent rabbinic ruling from Safed, Israel, banning the rental or sale of property to non-Jews provokes interfaith repugnance, raising tension and stifling respect. Will the edict lead to worsening conditions, or will it protect Israeli Jews?

Admittedly, my questions pose the issue as an extreme choice, but perhaps we should explore the edges to understand the implications of this position.

There are many facets to the current debate inside and outside Israel. Friends tell me that to trust outsiders is to be naive, and that renting to potential enemies is foolhardy. They see the rabbinic ban as logical, even rational in a world of terrorists. Historical injustices of the past point clearly to our need for caution and concern. Our past is filled with neighbours turning on us – one day friendly, the next murderous. We know of treachery and mistrust from Ashkenaz, Sepharad and the Middle East. "Their" track record calls for "our" prudence.

Others concur with the ban simply citing Jewish law. But that law is complex and not so clear. We are bound to safeguard our communities and homes, but it's not evident that this law is applicable here, nor that it should be implemented worldwide. Different Jewish communities require specific halachic approaches. That has always been our unique survival mechanism. We cannot accept one catholic view of the law.

Notably, we are proud of our heritage, but it was not one of isolation. The challenge before us is to know when to focus inward and when to open outward.

Our nation has thrived on openness to non-Jews. We shared and learned together. Our history is not a vale of tears, though sometimes there were hurricanes. We can boast a productive past in which we sometimes experienced a succession of good relationships with our neighbours.

Recently, I read a beautiful essay by a Cuban American Shabbos goy. Joe Velarde writes movingly of friendship, loyalty, honour and respect. We can almost taste the goodies he was fed as he performed those acts forbidden to Jews on Shabbat. In the process, he developed close relationships with his neighbours. They set a place for him at their Shabbos tables during World War II, praying for his safe return. From them he "discovered obedience without subservience... the worth of a strong work ethic... love of learning." If you don't rent to his family, they won't be your Shabbos goy, and they can't learn these Torah values from you.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Now a Canadian "goy" story of friendship and interfaith understanding: a young Jewish woman had two non-Jewish best friends. After her father died, they wondered how to help her through her grieving, how to bring her real comfort. They knew that she always went to synagogue on the High Holidays with her dad. The first year without him would not only be difficult, it would be impossible. With whom would she go? So they pledged to go with her – two non-Jewish girls helping one Jew celebrate in the way her father would want, and in the way she wanted and would find comfort. They still attend services with her every year.

Perhaps there is a difference between Israel and the rest of the Jewish world. Perhaps our Israeli family requires a different model of insider-outsider relationships. Perhaps. I can't judge. In fact, I would not be the judge of a universal Jewish ethic. We need to be cautious. Antisemitism is alive and well, and it exists all on its own, no matter what we do. But surely we should be careful of our own acts toward others.

We were strangers in a strange land. We should be circumspect in how we treat others. Remember what it feels like to be shunned.

Respect, protect, but don't offend.

Iran will not 'retreat an inch'

Later this month, in Istanbul, the United States and five other world powers – Russia, China, Britain, Germany and France – will resume discussions on Iran's disputed nuclear program, one of the thorniest unsettled problems in international politics today. As in the past, the six nations will ask Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment activities, in line with five previous United Nations Security Council resolutions.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But Iran, which recently announced that its stockpile of uranium has almost doubled in the past 12 months, will surely reject this demand. In the waning days of 2010, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, declared that Iran will not "retreat an inch" from pursuing nuclear technology.

Iran's obduracy is hardly new.

More than a year ago, in Geneva, the six powers and Iran reached a tentative agreement under which Iran would send much of its enriched uranium to Russia and France for conversion into non-fissile material for medical research. But amid political bickering within the Iranian government, the deal fell apart, giving Iran a free hand to return to the status quo ante.

U.S. President Barack Obama

Iran proceeded to refine roughly 7,000 pounds of lightly enriched uranium, twice the amount it possessed before the October 2009 accord collapsed.

The following May, in an obvious bid to derail a fourth round of UN economic sanctions, Iran negotiated an agreement with Turkey and Brazil that was remarkably similar to the one Iran's leaders had already spurned. To no one's surprise, the United States and its partners rejected the deal, saying Iran had bolstered its quantity of enriched uranium in the interval.

Last month, the six powers and Iran rehashed the issue in Geneva yet again, but the talks were difficult and the impasse was not broken.

The outcome was preordained. Ahmadinejad, having insisted that Israel's undeclared nuclear arsenal should be addressed as well, asserted that Iran's "nuclear rights" were not negotiable.

Ali Akbar Velayati, Iran's former foreign minister and current adviser to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, went further. In a definitive statement of Iran's policy, Velayati said the six powers "must be dreaming" if they think they can force Iran to give up its nuclear program.

Iran, which has hegemonic ambitions in the Middle East and has repeatedly called for Israel's annihilation, claims its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes only. But Iran's claim has always been implausible, given its imperial regional goals, its visceral hostility to Israel and its vast oil and natural gas reserves.

Since the defection of Iranian diplomat Mohammed Reza Heydari last winter, Iran's claim has been blown to pieces. Heydari, who was stationed in Oslo, Norway, has disclosed that Iran, with North Korea's help, is working toward developing an atomic bomb. Israel, the United States and the European Union most definitely concur with Heydari's assessment.

If Iran succeeds in building a nuclear arsenal, its power and prestige will soar, to the detriment of Israel, the United States and Sunni Muslim Arab countries, whose rivalry with Iran is well-known.

According to U.S. diplomatic cables released by WikiLeaks, Sunni Arab states have urged the United States to destroy Iran's nuclear infrastructure. Indeed, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia has implored the Obama administration to "cut off the head of the snake," while Qatar has supposedly agreed to allow the U.S. air force to use a base on its soil to bomb Iran.

Like these conservative Arab regimes and Israel, the United States opposes a nuclear-armed Iran. As U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said last year, "The United States is determined to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons."

Washington, however, appears to have ruled out military means to destroy or cripple Iran's nuclear program. Militarily stretched in Iraq and Afghanistan, the United States would not likely commit itself to a third front in Iran.

Although Obama administration officials have continually said that all options are open, the United States prefers a diplomatic resolution. As President Barack Obama has said, diplomacy is the "ideal way" to solve this problem.

Obama's secretary of defence, Robert Gates, has been just as emphatic. A military strike, he said while on a visit to Israel, would be counter-productive. "It will bring together a divided nation [and] make them absolutely committed to obtaining nuclear weapons," he argued.

Admiral Mike Mullen, the chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, agrees. A U.S. or Israeli strike on Iran would be "profoundly destabilizing" and could have serious "unintended consequences," he asserted.

Washington's overall attitude was probably best summed up by Undersecretary of Defence Michele Flournoy: "Military force is an option of last resort."

Not even Obama's hawkish predecessor, George W. Bush, seriously contemplated military force, as he writes in his newly published memoirs, Decision Points.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Although his vice-president, Dick Cheney, was an advocate of military force, Bush preferred to exercise restraint.

Nor did Bush budge when Israel's then prime minister, Ehud Olmert, expressed disappointment with American policy.

In the face of veiled threats from Israel and the United States, Iran has been outwardly fearless. Ahmadinejad has said that neither the United States nor Israel are capable of attacking its nuclear sites, while Khamenei has sounded similar sentiments.

Their rhetoric aside, Iranian leaders, have threatened dire consequences – a war with "no limits," Ahmadinejad said – should Israel or the United States act militarily.

Having concluded that a strike on Iran would ill serve its interests, the United States has supported four rounds of UN sanctions against Iran and unveiled its own regimen of sanctions.

According to Ahmadinejad, sanctions have not affected Iran. The United States counters that sanctions have scared off foreign investors.

Despite all the sanctions, U.S. companies still trade with Iran to the tune of billions of dollars.

To deter Iran, the United States has also upgraded the air and land defences of Arab states through massive arms sales and resorted to sabotaging Iran's nuclear program. The Stuxnet computer virus that struck Iran's centrifuges recently was apparently planted by the United States, if not Israel.

Obama, who began his presidency by offering Tehran a "new beginning," has come to the bitter realization that his conciliatory policy to engage Iran has not borne fruit. Iran is determined to build a nuclear arsenal and has responded to Obama's overture with, as he ruefully admitted, a "clenched fist."

Nothing beats a Matzoball on Christmas Eve

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

Instead of what for many Jews is the typical Christmas Eve fare of Chinese food, Dec. 24 was all about matzah and falafel.

Or at least that was the case for the more than 1,000 attendees who came out to the 22nd annual Matzoball and, for the 30-plus crowd, the Falafel Ball.

Held for the third year in a row at Six Degrees in the Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue area, Matzoball is a great way to meet other Jewish people on a night where there typically isn't much to do, said Jian Magen, the Canadian owner of the Matzoball franchise.

"It really started as a way just to have a good time and really turned into a universal or global evening of coming together for the tribe," he said.

"I've heard over the years countless stories of people saying they met at the Matzoball... and that's kind of what it's all about.

"I would probably say hundreds," Magen added, when asked how many matches have been made as a result of the Matzoball.

Held for the first time just up the street from the Matzoball, at Alleycatz, was the Falafel Ball.

When asked about the inspiration behind the event, Magen said it came from personal experience.

"As I mature in age and grow up a bit, I recognize that not everyone wants to be in the same room anymore. There is a slew of 19-to-30-year- olds that come to the party, as well as 30-to 50-year-olds... But there are also the [ones] that want something a little more low key.

"We built the Falafel Ball as an opportunity for people to go down the street from the Matzoball for a [crowd] that's strictly 30-plus.

"It's the best of both worlds. People in their 30s have a hard time remembering what it was like when they were in their 20s and would go to a few bars in a night. Here's [their] chance to go from bar to bar and know that [they're] in the comfort of a great environment."

The great environment is exactly why 23-year-old Shaun Bernstein attends. This was his second time attending the Matzoball, he said, and he came out with a few friends to meet new people.

"It's an interesting crowd, to say the least," he said dryly. "[Besides], what else is there to do on Christmas Eve?"

"We're the biggest party every year," Magen said. "It's become a tradition."

This year's event drew over 1,000 people. [Dara Skolnick photos]

Teen writes book for his bar mitzvah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Max Librach, 13, had a unique gift for the guests at his recent bar mitzvah.

He presented them with a book, 18 Mitzvot: 18 Steps to becoming a Bar Mitzvah, which he wrote and illustrated himself.

A Grade 8 student at Robbins Hebrew Academy, Max, son of Clifford and Judy, came up with the idea because he wanted to create a testament to his bar mitzvah.

"I wanted to show in writing how important my bar mitzvah was to me, and I decided to concentrate on 18 of the mitzvot that are part of my life.

"I hope that my book will encourage others to perform mitzvot in everyday life, not because they have to, but because they want to."

The 52-page book is divided into 18 chapters, one for each mitzvah, and each chapter was illustrated in pastels by Max.

In the first chapter, Believing in God, he said that the first time he knew he believed in God was when he had a concussion and "my parents told me if I believe, I will get better. God helped me when I needed healing physically and emotionally," he said.

The mitzvah of reciting the Shema also became very real to him, he said, when he was having an MRI connected to his concussion. "It wasn't so much scary as it was impossibly boring. Then, it came to me like a bolt of lightning – Shema. I recited all I knew by heart over and over again until I had no need to worry: I had God on my side, protecting me all the way."

He's fulfilling the mitzvah of charity, he said, by selling his book and donating all the proceeds to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto."

Max Librach

He said that Beth Tzedec Congregation, his family's shul, has expressed interest in using his book as part of its bar/bat mitzvah program.

Preparing for his bar mitzvah and writing the book has changed him as a person, he said. "It has deepened my connection to Judaism, and helped me confirm that a bar mitzvah is much, much more than a party and gifts."

Abuelaish calls for end of blame game in conflict

Abuelaish's daughters – Besan, 20, Mayar, 15 and Aya, 14 – and his niece, Nour, 14, were killed on Jan. 16, 2009, after two Israeli tank shells crashed into his house in Gaza.

According to Israel's statute of limitations, his case against Israel will effectively expire this week, on Jan. 16.

As a result, Abuelaish, who lives here with his five surviving children, aged eight to 21, decided to sue the Israeli government.

His lawyer, Michael Sfrad, filed the lawsuit on Dec. 26 at a district court in Jerusalem. He told Ynetnews that the ministry's decision is disgraceful and reflects badly on Israel.

He added, "I am not just angry as Dr. Abuelaish's lawyer. I am ashamed as an Israeli."

In an interview, Abuelaish, an intense and passionate person, was calm and spoke in measured tones.

"I don't know why Israel rejected my claim," said Abuelaish, whose recently published book, I Shall Not Hate, is about his life and daughters' deaths. "A human life is not subject to a statute of limitations. But I'm confident Israel will change its mind. Nothing is impossible."

Claiming to be neither angry nor bitter, he said he will continue to be patient and positive.

"I'm more determined than ever to work for peace," said Abuelaish, who completed a residency in obstetrics and gynecology at Israel's Soroka Hospital and who has established a foundation to promote health and education among Middle Eastern women. "This cause is holy and noble, and it will never be spoiled by bad things."

In filing a lawsuit, Abuelaish did not ask for a specific amount, saying he would let Israel's legal system determine what would be acceptable in terms of compensation.

If the court rules in his favour, the funds he receives will be channelled into his foundation, said Abuelaish, who plans to visit Israel in the spring to consult with supporters and proceed with his case.

He said the Palestinian Authority was never involved in his decision to sue the Israeli government. "I didn't want to politicize this issue," he explained.

Still a fervent believer in reconciliation and coexistence between Israelis and Palestinians, Abuelaish expressed confidence that a two-state solution is still possible.

He urged Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to take risks for peace and move forward in negotiations with the Palestinian Authority so that the "safety, dignity and security" of both Israelis and Palestinians can be assured.

He said Israel and the Palestinians should stop playing the blame game. "Let's get rid of this vicious and endless cycle of who's right or wrong and move forward in a positive way. That's what we need to do.

"Israelis and Palestinians are in the same boat. Can they understand that? They have one enemy: ignorance and denial of each other's rights."

Non-violence remains a viable option for both sides, he said. "Words are stronger than bullets, and weapons alone cannot guarantee the security of a country."

Judging by some items in his office, Abuelaish lives by this creed. A plaque on his bookshelf reads: "Life is good. Be kind. Be true. Seek peace. Keep the faith. Be a friend."

Jews in Toronto have rallied to his cause. Dr. Barbara Landau and her husband, Sy, sent an e-mail to The CJN that, in part, reads, "My hope is that the Jewish community in Canada will support a healing gesture on [his] behalf. I am a friend of Izzeldin and know how much he longs for a peaceful resolution, both of his own situation and to the broader Middle East crisis."

His story, the Landaus write, "offers a chance to build a bridge, both in the Middle East and Canada."

Do you hear God?

BY RABBI MEIR ROSENBERG

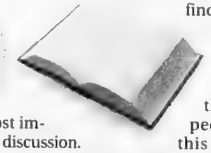
Contrary to popular belief, the revelation at Mount Sinai, is not the last time that God addressed the Jewish people. My teacher, Rabbi Berel Wein, used to quip that God spoke to him from the front page of the newspaper every day. How do you hear God?

Some time after our experience at Mount Sinai, the Jewish People built an earthly abode for God. It was called the Mishkan, or Tabernacle. At the entrance to the Tabernacle, God would speak to Moses and instruct him regarding various commandments

"It shall be a continual burnt offering throughout your generations at the door of the tent of the Lord, where I will meet with you, to speak to you there" (Exodus 29:42). Rashi, in commenting on this verse, informs us that there was a difference of opinion between our Sages as to where Moshe heard it from. Some maintain that the voice of God was heard from the copper altar, as the verse would indicate, while others maintain the voice was heard from between the Cherubim, as indicated in a later verse.

This discussion, while of great interest, is nevertheless secondary to the fact that Moses did hear the voice of God when he entered the Mishkan, at the time that God saw fit to speak to him. But it's of especially great significance to note how Moses hear that voice. Rashi tells us that Moses "hears the voice in and of himself." The voice was there to be heard, but it required a Moses to hear it. Others could not hear it, although it was a powerful voice that filled the Mishkan.

Rabbinic Reflections



I believe this is the most important point of the entire discussion. Many people ask today, "Why don't we hear the voice of God just like Moses and the other prophets? Why doesn't God give us a message just like he did to the great personalities of the Chumash? If there was any time when we needed to hear a message from God to guide us, it's now!"

But we sometimes forget that in order to hear the voice of God, one must be properly attuned to it, as was Moses. It's like watching TV or listening to the radio. All sorts of static, noise and voices can be heard on all the channels and stations. To hear the program we're interested in, we must tune in to the right channel. To distinguish good from bad requires training and education. Not all TV is good TV. All sorts of programs can be received from the airwaves, but it requires a certain depth of spirit and wisdom to find the right channel.

The same is true with the voice of God. HaShem speaks to us every day. In every era, there there have been people who have heard this voice – it simply requires a background of faith, religious application and, yes, much Torah study.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Wikileaks and Jewish law

If nothing else, Julian Assange of Wikileaks has confirmed the talmudic adage that our world is a world of falsehood. Our leaders have routinely been saying one thing in private and something very different in public. While Jewish law recognizes that in rare circumstances – such as the preservation of peace – one may indeed speak a mistruth, the released Wikileaks documents sadly highlight a culture of lying, one that tragically thwarts all efforts at peace.

Imagine if the numerous Arab states would actually admit publicly for the record their fear of the Iranian nuclear program and the need for concrete action to remove that threat. Imagine if they would work together with Israel to remove the greatest threat to the region and world peace. Alas, I have no doubt that if Israel was to singlehandedly remove the Iranian threat, these same Arab states would be the first to condemn Israel.

Yet confirming the wisdom of our sages doesn't justify the release of confidential information. Jewish law begins with the premise that all information to which one is privy is deemed to be of a confidential nature. That premise can be negated only when it's clear that information is meant for public consumption, such as having the information conveyed publicly.

Nonetheless, confidential information may – nay, must – be released in order to prevent harm, such as informing someone of serious character flaws in a prospective business partner, and when one is assured of the accuracy of the information. Even so, the information may only be told to those who have a need to know.

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

There are few, if any, cases where one has the option of releasing confidential information. Either it's forbidden to do so, or it's obligatory.

Even when it would otherwise be permissible (obligatory) to release information, there is a further condition that must be met – namely, one must be motivated solely for the purpose of preventing harm. One may not do so to settle personal scores or for riches. Even though, objectively speaking, one's motivation should be irrelevant – either the information needs to be revealed or it does not – Judaism is more concerned with the character of the informant than the nature of the information. Thus, even if one could actually believe an accused who is offered a plea bargain, his revealing words are tainted by the reduced sentence he stands to gain by snitching.

Leaving aside issues of motivation the initial question regarding Wikileaks is whether releasing the information is beneficial or harmful. Answering this question as an either or proposition is extremely complicated and all but impossible. The fallout, both good and bad, could go on for years. As there is no need for a yes or no answer, we can surmise that the answer is that the information fits both categories.

Releasing streams of information with little or no regard for its implications, including potential danger to the lives of many, is worse than irresponsible and clearly forbidden. At the same time, there are potential benefits to the release of at least selected information that may bring much needed transparency to the political realm. However, in the "false world" that we inhabit, it will take much pressure upon our political leaders to enable these benefits to be actualized.

Lockshin on Kugel on the religious impulse

Ten years ago, Prof. James Kugel, a deeply religious Jew and world-renowned scholar of Jewish studies, was told by his doctors that he had only two years to live, perhaps four with aggressive chemotherapy. His reaction was to do research and write a book about why human beings need religion.

In university circles, Kugel is best known for his cutting-edge scholarship on the Bible and early biblical interpretation. Much of his academic writing is characterized by deep literary insights into texts. (In fact, his earliest academic training was in comparative literature.) Two of his 11 published books have also received much attention in Jewish religious circles – one positively and one less so.

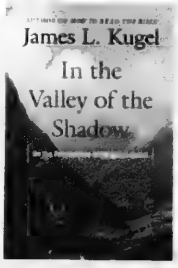
Twenty years ago, Kugel published On Being a Jew, a thoughtful apologia for living a life of Jewish religious observance, written in the form of a dialogue between a skeptical Jewish college student and his older observant relative. Many religious Jews and some "seekers" deeply appreciated the book.

Views & Reviews

By Martin Lockshin

Three years ago, Kugel published a book that (as he has repeatedly emphasized) was not directed to a religious Jewish audience, and not even specifically to Jews: How to Read the Bible. In the book, Kugel takes seriously the claims of biblical criticism – including the claim that the Torah was not a unitary composition authored by Moses – and does not dismiss them the way most Orthodox Jews do.

Despite the fact that Kugel was known to be an observant Jew, he suddenly found himself at the centre of a controversy. The hullabaloo about Kugel's beliefs became very public in 2009, when he spoke (on a different, non-controversial topic) at Yeshiva University, at the invitation of a student group. A number of rabbis and professors at this centrist Orthodox flagship institution spoke out strongly against having him speak on campus when, allegedly, he was known to espouse heretical beliefs.



In a few weeks, Kugel's book that was sparked by his cancer diagnosis, In the Valley of the Shadow (Free Press, 2011), is appearing in print. Thank God he is alive and well, and vigorously productive today, even if his doctors aren't quite sure why. Facing his own mortality, Kugel has marshalled poetry, history, the Bible, religious works from many traditions and an impressive knowledge of modern science, in an attempt to explain the origins of the human religious impulse.

Kugel rejects the silly assumption of many moderns that we have a more advanced understanding of what it means to be a human being than did our ancestors two or three thousand years ago. True, our knowledge of science has advanced greatly. But has our knowledge of ourselves also improved?

According to Kugel, one of the most significant ways that human self-understanding has changed in modern times (and not for the better) is that we (especially in western countries) tend to see ourselves and our own place in the world as being much "larger" or more significant than did the pre-moderns, who saw the world as very large but saw themselves as only very small players in it.

Kugel argues that one result of this perception is that death was easier for pre-modern people to face than it is for us today. People who do not recognize and think about their own smallness find the prospect of their own demise – or the demise of a loved one, since it reminds us so forcefully that we too shall not escape death – very frightening.

Many moderns, Kugel suggests, also tend to distort the meaning of a religious activity like prayer by seeing it as inwardly directed – as a form of introspection or meditation – and not as directed to forces beyond us. This, too, is a result of our tendency to see ourselves as large and significant and of our failure to approach the world with the humility of our ancestors.

Kugel claims that the outwardly directed religious impulse in human beings is natural; it shows up in virtually every culture in virtually every age. He ridicules those critics of religion who argue that religious feelings are simply a result of a lack of understanding of how the world really works. The corollary of this claim is often that, since we now understand the world so much better than our ancestors did, we have no more need for religion.

As he writes: "It's the equivalent of saying that once evolutionary biologists have fully explained the forces responsible for the particular characteristics of human courtship behaviour, and once neuroscientists can tell us exactly how our brains have been shaped to create the various neural interactions that foster attraction between males and females of reproductive age, then we can at last stop falling in love and reconfigure the business of mate selection on purely scientific grounds."

Only a very small part of this book is autobiographical, but it is perhaps the most moving section. I found much to smile about in Kugel's critical analysis of most medical doctors and their extremely narrow worldview. Kugel rejects the assumption that only western medicine has anything of value to say about disease and healing. The book includes a moving description by a sensitive surgeon of how the Dalai Lama's personal physician impressed the best doctors of New Haven with his very unusual diagnostic skills, ones that had nothing to do with what doctors learn in western medical schools.

I highly recommend this book to readers who want to consider the big questions of life and the tiny place of humans in this world. I hesitate to suggest it, but perhaps we have all benefited from James Kugel's near brush with death. I pray that God continue to grant him the good health he needs to keep teaching and inspiring us for many more years.

The new German antisemitism

By DONALD SNYDER
JTA

BERLIN — Muslim teenagers in Hanover attack an Israeli dance troupe, reportedly yelling "Juden raus" ("Jews get out") as they hurl stones.

German leftists march in Berlin with Muslims to protest the 2008–2009 Gaza military conflict. "Death to the Jews!" the marchers chant.

At a soccer game between teams from the St. Pauli section of Hamburg and the city of Chemnitz in eastern Germany, the Chemnitz fans shout "Sieg heil" and wave imitation Nazi flags.

This is happening in a country where Holocaust education has long been mandatory and where expressions of antisemitism and the dissemination of hatred are illegal. Holocaust denial is a crime in Germany.

But generational and demographic changes are converging in Germany today, and a shift is afoot in the Zeitgeist. While Germany continues to contend with vestiges of traditional antisemitism, a new and more deeply embedded strain has emerged related to Israel. Polls show that this strain is distinguishable from mere opposition to Israeli policies, or even from anti-Zionism. In a 2010 report by the University of Bielefeld's Institute for Interdisciplinary Research on Conflict and Violence, institute researchers, who conduct an annual poll on antisemitism, found an increase linked specifically to Israel. Among their findings:

- More than 57 per cent of those polled agreed that Israel is waging "a war of annihilation" against the Palestinians (up from 51 per cent in 2009).
- In 2008 – the most recent year the question was asked – more than 40 per cent agreed that "what Israel is doing to the Palestinians is basically no different from what the Nazis did with the Jews during the Third Reich."
- More than 38 per cent of Germans polled agreed that "considering the politics of Israel, it is easy to see why one would have something against Jews" (up from 34 per cent in 2009).

Yet, at the same time, 67.5 per cent in the 2010 poll agreed with the statement, "I like it that increasingly more Jews live in Germany."

"As a psychologist, I think that this reflects ambivalent attitudes," Beate Küpper, one of the researchers who produced the report, wrote in an e-mail to the Forward. "Germans are happy if there are some Jews in their country, as this gives us release. It shows off that we are tolerant… However, the strong blaming of Israel common in Germany (because we like peace and go for the weaker…) is full of antisemitic stereotypes [and] associations."

Mirko Niehoff, a 31-year-old social worker who works with Muslim youth, said he sees aspects of these trends in his daily work. "We realized we were dealing with a new antisemitism with roots in the Middle East conflict," he said.

Observers say that Muslim and classic right-wing antisemitism are combining with a left-wing demonization of Israel to produce a toxic mix, despite Germany's postwar efforts to ensure that future generations continue to learn the lessons of the Holocaust. This new strain renders old ways of combating antisemitism less effective. According to some observers, in Germany, the Holocaust narrative is no longer the powerful antidote it once was.

When former public school teacher Sebastian Voigt, now a doctoral candidate at the University of Leipzig, told his teenage students they would study the Nazi period, many complained that they had already studied the Holocaust.

This alienation from German history is compounded by the fact that many Muslim youths don't feel accepted as Germans themselves. They show little interest in this dark chapter of German history.

Meanwhile, many of Germany's four million Muslims stay connected with events in the Middle East via cable television networks, such as Hezbollah's Al-Manar and Hamas' Al-Aqsa. These antisemitic networks promote Holocaust denial.

"You cannot undo with education what these satellite broadcasts are doing," Matthias Kuntzel, an author and political scientist, said in a phone interview from Hamburg.

The programs are fed to Germany via Egyptian and Saudi Arabian satellites. Both countries have refused repeated German requests to stop transmitting Al-Manar. Although Al-Manar was banned in 2008, private homes with satellite dishes continue to receive its programs, making the ban ineffective.

To be sure, both Israel's continued occupation of the West Bank and its invasion and blockade of Gaza are substantive issues criticized by the majority of Germans. Taken at face value, opposition to Israel need not be assumed to be antisemitic. But the majority who tell pollsters they view Israel's actions toward the Palestinians as a "war of annihilation" and "principally not different than what the Nazis did with the Jews during the Third Reich" reflect a country in which the lines are blurred between opposition to Israeli actions and policies and antisemitism.

According to Lars Rensmann, an expert on antisemitism from Germany who teaches political science at the University of Michigan, for reasons peculiar to his native country, hatred of Jews may lurk below the surface even at protests that stop short of overt antisemitism.

"It's not so legitimate to attack Jews in Germany, so you attack Israel as a state – the collective Jew that represents the memory of the Holocaust," Rensmann said.

Despite widespread criticism of Israel within Germany, Chancellor Angela Merkel's government continues to strongly support the Jewish state. Yoram Ben-Zeev, Israeli ambassador to Germany, spoke enthusiastically about his relationship with the chancellor during an interview at his embassy.

Still, Ben-Zeev conceded, the German public has a negative view of Israel, as does most of Europe. Germany's support for Israel, normally unwavering, is no longer automatic. Last July, the Bundestag unanimously condemned Israel for its attack on the Mavi Marmara, the Turkish ship bound for Gaza with humanitarian aid.

"The resolution condemning Israel was scary," said Lala Susskind, president of the Jewish Community in Berlin. "It was the first time the left and the right were united in criticizing Israel."

Still, German leftists like Petra Pau, a member of the Left party in the Bundestag, condemn Israeli actions while demonstrating steadfast opposition to antisemitism.

Others, such as Alfred Grosser, a prominent Franco-German Jewish intellectual, maintain that Israeli actions fuel antisemitism throughout the world.

Grosser, 85, a controversial figure who survived the Holocaust as a protected French citizen during World War II, equates Gaza with a concentration camp. And he accuses the Central Council Of Jews in Germany of silencing any criticism of Israel.

A number of organizations in Germany are trying to combat the new antisemitism. One innovative program is Active Against Antisemitism, designed by the American Jewish Committee, for Muslim children in Berlin schools.

In another program, at the Jewish Museum in Berlin, Murat Akan, a 32-year-old German of Turkish ancestry, is one of five Turkish guides the museum employs to encourage Muslim youth to learn about Germany's rich Jewish heritage. Some 200,000 Muslims live in Berlin, a city with a population of 3.5 million. While some of the Muslim teenagers sympathize with the Jewish victims of the Holocaust, Akan said, others are openly antisemitic.

"They often ask me why they should feel connected to anything that happened in German history, like the Holocaust," Akan said. "We have to teach them why it's so important to learn what hatred can do."

Another innovative program, Kreuzberger Initiative Gegen Antisemitismus, or Kreuzberg Initiative Against Antisemitism, concentrates its efforts on the predominantly Turkish neighbourhood of Kreuzberg. The initiative also conducts workshops on antisemitism and the Middle East conflict.

These innovative programs suggest ways in which the Holocaust narrative can still speak to future generations.

Last October, Andres Nader, 41, a doctor of comparative cultures, took a group of Palestinian teenagers to Auschwitz in a trip sponsored by the Amadeu Antonio Foundation, an organization that combats neo-Nazism, racism and antisemitism. The foundation honours the memory of a black man from Angola who was murdered by young Germans.

Nader said that something shifted for these teenagers in Auschwitz. The young people were shocked by the murder of so many Jews in this place. They said they would never again use the word "Jew" as an insult.

"I don't know how people could do this to other human beings," one boy said. "I just can't imagine anyone murdering my little sister."

Shas maverick wants more Israeli haredim to work

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Not so long ago, few Israelis had heard of Rabbi Chaim Amsellem, a soft-spoken Shas backbencher in the Knesset.

Over the past few weeks, however, Rabbi Amsellem has emerged as a maverick in Israeli politics. Having broken ranks with the Orthodox-oriented Shas and its haredi leaders, he's talking about establishing a new party to challenge for the Sephardi vote.

It's not so much the politics that makes Rabbi Amsellem's move significant. The chances are slim that other Shas Knesset members will break with the party to join him.

Rather, Rabbi Amsellem's very public rejection of Shas orthodoxy is part of an emerging movement in the Israeli Sephardi world against the rigid Orthodoxy that Shas leaders have tried to impose on followers.

Indeed, Rabbi Amsellem speaks of nothing less than a Sephardi "social and cultural revolution," which his new party would both tap into and promote.

At the heart of the movement is a novel reassessment of the idea of the "society of Torah scholars," perhaps the most fundamental formative principle of the haredi world.

Both Shas and the Ashkenazi haredi parties hold that virtually all young haredi men should devote themselves solely to Torah study, as a society of Torah scholars who are exempted from mandatory army service as long as they stay in the yeshiva. This has led to deep poverty in the haredi community, because rather than serve in the Israel Defence Forces, many haredi men choose to stay on indefinitely in the yeshivas.

Rabbi Amsellem and others want to change this approach. Rabbi Amsellem advocates a society of Torah scholars comprising only a small elite of specially gifted students, with all others serving in the army and joining the labour force. This, he argues, is the true, more lenient Sephardi approach: a productive, working life combined with Torah study whenever time allows. Rabbi Amsellem says excessive Ashkenazi or "Lithuanian" influence led Sephardim to embrace the model of an all-inclusive society of Torah scholars.

Now, he says, it's time to break free from such thinking, mainly because it perpetuates a state of poverty among haredim.

"Our goal is that people who genuinely study should get a real cost-of-living stipend, not just pennies," Rabbi Amsellem told JTA in an interview. "This will be possible only when those who are genuinely part of the society of Torah scholars devote themselves to study, and those who aren't combine Torah study and work, the way the Sephardim down the ages have always done."

Rabbi Amsellem's ideas reflect major social changes already underway in the haredi world.

"Over the past few years, we are witnessing a dramatic increase in the number of haredim enlisting in the army," said Asher Cohen, a Bar-Ilan University political scientist who focuses on religious parties and movements. "We also see a growing trend of both men and women going to colleges of higher education. People are trying to break out of the vicious cycle of poverty, as happens in any normal society. They are studying and looking for work."

Rabbi Amsellem's ideas enjoy public support

Cohen believes the notion of the society of Torah scholars is already collapsing; it's just that haredi leaders are not ready to admit it or condone it.

The numbers alone suggest that something serious is happening. A decade ago, hardly any haredim served in the IDF. When a special haredi infantry battalion was established in 1999, it had just 30 soldiers. Today it has more than 1,000, including three companies at various stages of training, and two combat units. Another 1,000 haredim serve in special haredi technological units in the Air Force, Navy and intelligence corps.

In Israel, where the IDF is a vehicle for giving young Israelis marketable skills for later in life, these numbers are significant not just to the military but for Israeli society as a whole: these haredim are picking up skills for the job market.

An additional 1,000 haredim are enrolled in National Service, an alternative to military service that makes it possible for them to join the job market without being drafted into the IDF.

The number of haredim studying mainly vocational secular subjects in haredi colleges or secular colleges with special programs for haredim has more than quadrupled since 2005, to approximately 5,000. Most of the students are women – many of them, ironically, in institutions supported by Shas.

The government also is playing a key role. Education Minister Gideon Sa'ar has proposed a blueprint to increase the numbers by another 3,000 over the next five years. The Trade and Industry Ministry has launched special vocational courses for haredim and offers incentives to businesses that employ them.

These programs clearly are meeting a growing need. In a recent poll conducted by Chakima, an institute that helps haredim prepare for higher education, 53 per cent of haredim said they would be interested in studying for a secular profession in a religious, gender-segregated classroom environment.

The new trend seems to be fuelled by a confluence of interest between haredim desperate to break out of the cycle of poverty and a government eager to bring them into the labour force. Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz has even suggested waiving for haredim the national requirement to serve in the IDF, so they can go straight into the workforce.

> 'Change only happening at a snail's pace because there is no leadership'
> — Rabbi Chaim Amsellem

Employment of haredi men will increase rapidly over the next decade, the Ministry of Trade and Industry forecasts. Some Israelis are talking about the emergence of a haredi middle class.

Others, however, see a much slower change. They note that some 50,000 haredi students still have IDF exemptions that are valid only as long as they stay in yeshiva and don't work (until a certain age).

Holding back change are haredi leaders who believe that dramatic or rapid change may destroy the very fabric of haredi society.

"It's only happening at a snail's pace because there is no real leadership," Rabbi Amsellem said. "No one has stood up and openly said this is the way things ought to be except me."

Rabbi Amsellem wants to build a genuinely socially concerned party independent of rabbinic fiat. Unlike conventional haredi Orthodoxy, which turns its back on modernity and often on the secular Israeli state, Rabbi Amsellem is willing to entertain a working symbiosis between haredi Orthodoxy and the modern world. He also is unabashedly ready to call himself a Zionist.

His positions have earned him rogue status in Shas. In late November, the Shas Council of Torah Sages expelled Rabbi Amsellem from the party and demanded that he hand over the Knesset seat he had won on the Shas ticket. Rabbi Amsellem refused, resulting in a campaign of discreditation. Placards in Jerusalem and Bnei Brak compared Rabbi Amsellem to Amalek, the biblical Israelites' worst enemy.

Among the haredi leadership, Rabbi Amsellem is very much a lone figure. His ideas, however, enjoy wide public support. In an early December poll by the Panels Research Institute, 52 per cent of Israelis polled said enlisting haredim in the army and having them join the workforce was the only way to save haredi society. An astonishingly high 22 per cent of haredim concurred.

Despite evidence of some support among haredim for such change, the chances of Rabbi Amsellem being politically successful are minimal as long as Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the nonagenarian spiritual mentor of the Shas Party, is alive. His impolitic remarks about non-Jews notwithstanding, Rabbi Yosef commands universal praise within Shas, and even from Rabbi Amsellem.

"I don't think anyone could defy Rabbi Ovadia and win votes," Bar-Ilan University's Cohen observed. "And I don't see rabbis, even those who say privately that Amsellem is right, joining a political movement that challenges a rabbinical authority of Ovadia's stature."

Using the power of poetry to promote Mideast peace

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The proverbial pen is mightier than the sword, and two Montreal poets hope that when words are put into verse they will be even more powerful.

Endre Farkas and Carolyn Marie Souaid have created Blood is Blood, a passionate, frank, spoken-word performance about the Middle East that blends their respective poetry and voices.

It had its premiere at the Segal Centre for Performing Arts this fall, and now the text has been published as a book (Signature Editions) accompanied by a specially produced 15-minute video of them performing against different backdrops in the city.

The two had been colleagues and friends for years when that relationship was strained during the 2006 war between Israel and Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Hungarian-born Farkas is the son of Holocaust survivors; Souaid, a Christian, is of Lebanese descent. Both are educators as well as published poets (17 collections between them). He is a retired CEGEP instructor, and she teaches high school.

During the 2006 summertime conflict, the two conducted a lengthy e-mail correspondence in which they candidly expressed their diverging perspectives.

It was an eye-opener for both of them, as neither had thought of themselves as especially engaged with the Middle East. But deeply rooted emotions came to the fore.

Farkas's fears for Jewish survival clashed with Souaid's dismay over seeing the devastation to the land not only of her ancestors, but of her adopted son.

Their electronic conversation soon took the form of poetry, and then they began presenting their poetic encounter publicly.

When CBC Radio became interested, they produced a 10-minute drama that was broadcast nationally in December 2006. Over the intervening years, Farkas and Souaid have continued to combine their creativity into something they think speaks to today's Mideast tensions and the maddening relations between Jews and Arabs.

"We, as poets, decided to take on this challenge, both personal and political, through our art," Farkas said. "It is important for artists to be engaged in the debate."

It also saved their friendship.

"We feel we bring a perspective in form and in content to the ongoing Middle East conflict that is fresh and vital," Souaid said.

Both realized the horror and futility of so much spilled blood, and that's the origin of the title, which also suggests the kinship between Jews and Arabs.

The two presented Blood is Blood on-stage at the recent launch of the book and video at Casa del Popolo on St. Laurent Boulevard. In addition to being gifted writers in an underappreciated literary form, they are both spellbinding dramatic readers.

Their delivery, both solo and in duet, ranged from hushed whispers to loud declamation. They spoke different and competing lines simultaneously, yet each voice was distinct. At regular intervals, they joined together in chorus. They call it "harmony and cacophony," reflecting the chaotic region.

Farkas and Souaid start out sounding like kids fighting in the schoolyard. "I was here first. No, I was here first/ My god can beat up your god, No, mine can beat yours," and so on, until one says, "I killed you. No, I killed you first," making plain how high the stakes are in this game of brinkmanship.

Poets Carolyn Marie Souaid and Endre Farkas perform Blood is Blood, a literary appeal for peace in the Middle East.

This is not a sentimental plea for peace or brotherhood. Both tell their people's history as they see it, expressing suspicions and prejudices in accusatory tones.

Ultimately, they see the error of each other's "tribal bravado" and the cycle of retribution, or as they put it, "an eye for an eye until everyone is blind."

"It's political but we didn't want it to be didactic," said Souaid. "We didn't want everything wrapped up neatly at the end."

Both agree that, as Canadians living here, it's relatively easy for them to talk to each other in a way those in the Middle East cannot or will not do.

Farkas and Souaid have worked over the years to bring poetry to the people. They were behind the 2004 project that saw poetry posted on 800 Montreal buses; they organize the cabaret of performance poetry called Circus of Words, the sixth edition of which was held at the Segal this year; and they founded and edit Poetry Quebec, an online English-language poetry magazine.

Now they hope to bring Blood is Blood to a wider audience, including high schools, because they believe its themes can be applied to other conflicts. At their website www.bloodisblood.com, teachers can download free of charge Quebec government-approved materials based on the book and video. Farkas and Souaid are prepared to go anywhere in the province to bring their message of tolerance.

Five dollars from the sale of each book/video, which sells for $20, is to be donated to Dans la rue, an organization that helps homeless youth in Montreal.

Quebec's French media slams anti-Israel campaign

Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) began Saturday afternoon demonstrations Oct. 2 outside Le Marcheur, which has been in existence for more than 30 years. The handful of demonstrators hold placards denouncing Israel's alleged violations of Palestinian rights and hand out pamphlets explaining why Quebecers should not buy Israeli goods as a way of pressuring its government.

PAJU is the group that held weekly demonstrations outside the Israeli consulate for seven years until a couple of years ago, when the consulate moved from downtown to Westmount Square.

The picketing at Le Marcheur was ignored by the mainstream media until Khadir showed up on Dec. 11, when holiday shopping was at its height. Québec solidaire officially endorsed the so-called boycott, sanctions and divestment campaign against Israel in November 2009, and Khadir, the party's sole MNA, has since tried to get the National Assembly to entertain a motion on the issue.

Soon after Khadir's appearance, the Journal de Montréal ran a story quoting Le Marcheur owner Yves Archambault complaining that he was being "harassed" by the deputy for the adjacent riding of Mercier and charging that Khadir would do better to promote business in the Plateau Mont-Royal than thwart it.

Eric Duhaime, a columnist for the QMI Agency news service and leader of the new right-wing Réseau-Liberté Québec movement, was soon denouncing the leftist Khadir for his "radicalism."

Duhaime was a guest on the TV talk show hosted by former Action démocratique leader Mario Dumont on the V network (the renamed TQS).

Other Journal columnists such as Richard Martineau and Joseph Facal also castigated Khadir and the boycott "crusade."

In a lengthy analysis in the magazine L'Actualité, Jean-François Lisée concluded the term aparthejd doesn't apply to Israel.

But the most hard-hitting condemnation came from Lysiane Gagnon at La Presse. Under the headline "Khadir le fanatique," she deplored his "obsessional anti-Zionism."

In his retort, Khadir shot back that his party's goal is to boycott Israeli products, not the merchants who sell them, and that he tried in vain to explain this position to Le Marcheur's owner. Archambault has refused to give in to the protesters' demands or meet them face to face.

"My intention was not to encourage the boycott of this merchant, and I hope that any misunderstanding will be finally cleared up soon, when PAJU will have re-evaluated its action and its approach."

Khadir said he can't accept being portrayed as "a fanatic motivated by hatred of an ethnic group," and wondered why he hasn't been labelled anti-Iranian for his 30 years of protesting Islamic rule in the country where he was born.

Anti-boycott activist Sharon Freedman agrees that targeting Le Marcheur has failed miserably, and she thinks Khadir is "in retreat" thanks to "the French media questioning his real underlying motives and agenda," as well as the many people from inside and outside the Jewish community who have purposely patronized the store.

"Mr. Khadir, an MNA from a nearby area, is supposed to represent and promote all the businesses... He doesn't care for the employees that could have lost their jobs if morally thinking people had not acted and remained indifferent," she said.

Freedman raised more than $3,000, much of it her own money, to buy shoes at Le Marcheur, which she donated to the Welcome Hall Mission for homeless men before Christmas.

Jacob Kincler, another individual who is trying to counter the boycott, recently received a phone call from the president of Rishon Lezion-based Onyx Footwear Industries Ltd. which makes BeautiFeel, the brand Le Marcheur stocks.

Ami Bar-Nahor has been following the anti-boycott effort from the start and is grateful to the Montreal Jewish community and its supporters, Kincler said.

Mideast Christians under siege, except in Israel

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

An important Mideast development that has largely been ignored for years by western media, the plight and decline of Christian communities, jumped to the front pages of Canadian newspapers last week.

The occasion was dramatic – 21 Coptic Christians were killed and 97 wounded in an apparent suicide bombing at Saints Church in Alexandria, Egypt, on New Year's Day.

Christians are a significant minority in Egypt, numbering about 10 per cent of the population. For the last several decades, they've been besieged by the growth of radical Islamist forces hostile to the tolerance accorded Christians in previous periods.

A Jan. 4 Toronto Star editorial on the subject drew attention to the warnings of Egyptian journalist Hani Shukrallah that anti-Christian attitudes are spreading to even moderate Muslims.

In fact, Shukrallah is not just any journalist. He's the managing editor of Egypt's Al-Ahram weekly, and, significantly, he's a Copt. On the paper's English-language website, ahramonline, he wrote the following on Jan. 1 under the Zola-inspired title "J'accuse":

"It is not easy to empty Egypt of its Christians. They've been here for as long as there has been Christianity in the world. Close to a millennium and half of Muslim rule did not eradicate the nation's Christian community. Rather, it maintained it sufficiently strong and sufficiently vigorous so as to play a crucial role in shaping the national, political and cultural identity of modern Egypt.

"Yet now, two centuries after the birth of the modern Egyptian nation state, and as we embark on the second decade of the 21st century, the previously unheard of seems no longer beyond imagining: a Christian-free Egypt, one where the cross will have slipped out of the crescent's embrace and off the flag symbolizing our modern national identity. I hope that if and when that day comes, I will have been long dead, but dead or alive, this will be an Egypt which I do not recognize and to which I have no desire to belong."

With particular boldness, Shukrallah dismissed the government's attempt to point a finger at Al Qaeda as the perpetrator of the Alexandria attack and instead blamed Cairo's political leadership. "I accuse a government that seems to think that by outbidding the Islamists it will also outflank them," he charged.

"But most of all, I accuse the millions of supposedly moderate Muslims among us, those who've been growing more and more prejudiced, inclusive and narrow-minded with every passing year."

Amira Nowaira, writing in the Guardian on Jan. 5, noted that she grew up in Egypt in a traditional Muslim family and recalls positive Muslims-Christian relations. These started to deteriorate, she claims, with the growth of religious extremism under then-Egyptian president Anwar Sadat in the 1970s when he "actively encouraged and sponsored the Islamist movement, hoping that it might devour the left, which he regarded as his most potent enemy." The resulting Muslim-Coptic divide has since deepened, with successive governments doing nothing to prevent it, while blaming outside forces such as Al Qaeda and Israel for the rancour.

"The regime went out of its way to prove to its citizens that it was more Islamic than the Islamists themselves and silently watched the growing vehemence of religious intolerance," Nowaira charged.

Egypt is far from the only country where Christians are under threat from radical Muslim factions and movements. The Star editorial also mentioned recent attacks on Christians in Iraq, Nigeria and the Philippines.

Over many years, especially as Hezbollah has become dominant in the country, Lebanon's traditionally large Christian community has sharply declined. The small Christian community in Gaza has dwindled since Hamas took control. Even in the West Bank, historic Christian centres have shrunk. For instance, Bethlehem had a substantial Christian majority when the Palestinian Authority took control in 1995, yet today it makes up only 20 per cent of the population.

The only country in the Middle East where the number of Christians has been on the rise is Israel, growing fourfold since the founding of the state in 1948.

Centre for Jewish Studies presents lecture series

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

The Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto is once again holding its renowned public lecture series.

Beginning this month, the series is held a few times each year, said Prof. Hindy Najman, the centre's director.

The centre encourages bridge-building between the community and the university, and one of the ways it does this is through the public lecture series. All the lectures are free and open to anyone.

"They're lectures that are geared to faculty and students, the community," said Najman. "Most of them are evening talks. They're meant to be open to the community.

"We have some very exciting talks about ancient Judaism... We also have a number of talks about Israel. I think it's very important for the centre – which can't be politicized – to be a context where the University of Toronto and Canada more generally can learn about what Jewish culture and Jewish civilization is."

The winter 2011 lectures, which run to April, include, among others, a talk on King Solomon and the search for wisdom by Steven Weitzman from Stanford University; "Israel: A New Narrative" with Donniel Hartman, president of the Shalom Hartman Institute; "Law and Morality in the Jewish Tradition" with Hebrew University's Izhak Englard; "Music: The 'Jew' of Jewish Studies" with Edwin Seroussi from Hebrew University, with a performance by Cantor Benny Maissner and Toronto's Lachan Chamber Choir.

"We try to have a balance so it appeals broadly to our community, and I also want to reinforce the interests of the faculty and the students," Najman said.

"I consult my students and faculty a lot on who to bring and when to bring them. When we have endowed lectures, I don't just bring one person in one area. I try to bring two or three people. We often create a conversation across colleagues, and whenever I can, I bring scholars from Israel to help reinforce our relationship with Israel."

The lectures have consistently been a great success, she continues – so much so that finding a large enough space on campus to support the demand has proven difficult.

"Our events are regularly standing room only, and the one criticism that we've received is that we need bigger spaces."

The Program for Jewish Studies at the university was established in 1967, and in 2008 it became the Centre for Jewish Studies. It offers undergraduate and graduate programs, and has sent many students to Israel.

"We run over 100 courses every year in Jewish studies," Najman said. "We coordinate with 25 different faculties and programs throughout the Faculty of Arts and Science. [There are] over 2,000 undergraduates taking our courses at the St. George campus. We're a hub for students to find their way to Israel, especially to Hebrew University... we also have sent our students to Haifa, Tel Aviv and Bar Ilan."

The public lectures run from Jan. 17 to April 15. For a list of speakers and topics, visit www.cjs.utoronto.ca.

EFFORTS RECOGNIZED: NCSY Canada's Thornhill student chapter board prepared New Year's Eve holiday dinners for members of York Region's emergency service providers at two fire stations and one police station in the Thornhill area. Knowing that it's challenging to be away from family on a holiday, the teens wanted to say thank you for the role they play in the community. The teens are pictured with firefighters from Fire Station No. 7-2.

A cookbook for those who love nostalgia

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

When Bracha Weingrod and her family moved to Israel in 1974, a professor friend gave them a Yiddish cookbook, Dos Familien Kokh Bookh, published in 1914, as a housewarming gift. Weingrod had been a Yiddish teacher in Winnipeg and Chicago.

Then, while she and her husband were on sabbatical in New York in 1982, a woman who was taping interviews from Jewish women asked her to translate. That sparked her interest in having someone bring her the Yiddish cookbook she had been given eight years before, and she decided to read it.

While living in Jerusalem, Weingrod had founded and run the Israel Dyslexia Association and the Kohl Teachers' Center and taught at the David Yellin Teachers' College. After she retired from teaching at the College, she began to translate the cookbook.

The result was The Yiddish Family Cookbook, edited and translated by Weingrod (self-published, Amazon Createspace, paperback, 2010).

What we have now is a charming "documentation of a slice of history," edited and translated with deep love by a woman with a special love of Yiddish.

Hasia Diner, an American Jewish history professor and author, has written the introduction in which she explains that this cookbook, published in 1914 (and reprinted in 1915, 1922 and 1928), was written to show how to negotiate the American kitchen and American way of life through Yiddish.

Charming slice of history

The author "claimed to teach immigrant Jewish women how to perpetuate Jewish culture and advance integration into American life through cooking."

Who was the author? That's uncertain. The English text in the book was written by lexicographer and writer Alexander Harkavy, and by David Moses Hermalin, a Yiddish author, but there is no proof that either of them wrote the actual cookbook, and research has not uncovered the origin of H. Braun, who was listed as the author of the book.

In the first chapter, H. Braun writes: "Even in the land of plenty – America – one must 'tease' the appetite." So he or she introduces appetizers (forshpeizen) and talks about appetizers, gives a recipe and offers practical and sound advice.

Soups (zupen) yields 25 recipes and advice such as: "The best soup in the world is turtle soup. Turtle is a porpoise, and since this is treif, we Jews make a mock turtle soup, that is, a soup that tastes almost the same."

The chapter on fish has 11 recipes plus great comments. For example: "The popular fish of our old world was the carp. An American would never eat carp, even if you paid him!"

Meat (fleisch) contains 23 recipes and the author writes: "The English and the Americans are the greatest fressers of meat… Meat for proper cooking should be at least three days old from the time it's slaughtered."

About sauces for meat, the author writes that "it is the sauce that plays a great role in giving many foods their taste, but if not prepared correctly the stomach will protest."

A few Passover recipes are inserted next.

A section on "caring for a sick one" warns us that "people who don't know how to cook for a sick one can very easily make them even sicker."

This then runs into salads and sandwiches. And there are a few recipes for pasta, rice and eggs. "A good housewife must always be sure to buy first-class rice and not bargains."

In the chapter on breads and cakes, with 17 recipes, the author discusses flour and yeast. "Seasoned balebostes [housewives] are able to tell if the dough is ready by sticking a hand in up to the knuckles and pulling it out – if the dough springs back, it is ready to be put aside to rise."

"The art of making good pastry is very difficult to master," we are told as we read 17 pastry and pudding recipes.

In the chapter on greens, we learn that "the housewife must know that often a meal without greens does not have much worth."

Other marks of wisdom include: "There is no better digestive aid than a fruit dessert, if it is made properly."

Custards, preserves, jams, jellies ("Many good housewives do not know that the best fruit jellies can be made from the peel or rind of fruit."), pickles, tea, coffee ("Americans make coffee from fine grounds and cook them up and serve the coffee with milk. If the coffee is freshly roasted and freshly ground, it is very good. But since this is rarely prepared this way, it is far from a bargain.") Final chapters cover tea, ice cream and candies. All in all, there are about 200 recipes.

At the end are excerpts from Harkavy's English supplement.

"This book is definitely geared to those who love history as much as cooking," Weingrod, who lives in Jerusalem, says. "It is a picture of a time during the 'Great Immigration' when Jewish women were anxious to become Americans or Canadians, when they wanted to imitate their neighbours, speak like them, understand them, buy like them and COOK like them."

Among the things Weingrod found amusing were descriptions of how to test the heat of an oven, what times of the year are best for herring and other fish, what is harmful for the stomach, how to prevent store owners from cheating unsuspecting women, how to test whether a fish is fresh and how to test if a chicken is young or old.

One must mention the cover illustration from YIVO (the Institute for Jewish Research) and the inside illustrations from the Museum of New York, the Tenement Museum, HIAS (Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society) and old post cards. All add to the authenticity of the book.

This is definitely a book for those who cannot resist nostalgia, who love old memories of a time gone by and who have some roots in the immigrant generation of that period.

Celebrate the fruits of the Land

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

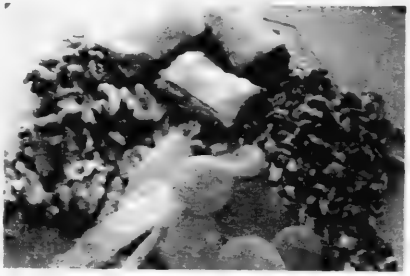
Tu b'Shvat is the Jewish New Year for the trees. Although celebrated throughout the Jewish world, it is an especially joyous holiday in Israel. Homes are decorated with fruits and flowers, there are tree-planting ceremonies, and a growing custom is to have a Tu b'Shvat seder.

There are many variations of Tu b'Shvat seders, but all are loosely based on a Passover seder. Many find this simply an occasion to get together with friends and family, but others include readings about trees and fruit from different kinds of Jewish literature. It is traditional to eat a new fruit which has not been eaten previously in the past year.

Four glasses of wine are drunk: white, blush, rose and red. Fifteen different types of fruits and nuts are served – five from each of the following three categories:

- fruits or nuts with an inedible outer shell and an edible inner core: pineapple, coconut, orange, pomello, banana, walnut, pecan, grapefruit, starfruit, pinenut, pomegranate, papaya, brazil nut, pistachio or almond;
- fruits with edible outer flesh and pits: olive, date, cherry, loquat, peach, apricot, persimmon, avocado or plum;
- fruits that are edible throughout: strawberry, grape, raisin, fig, raspberry, blueberry, cranberry, carob, apple, pear, kiwi or quince;

Crackers or bread made out of wheat and barley are also eaten.



SEVEN SPECIES SALAD

lettuce, (any kind, but the baby is good) seeds from 1/2 to 1 ripe pomegranate
6 to 8 figs, quartered
seedless grapes, halved or quartered
2 to 4 dates,pitted and sliced almonds, walnuts or pecans croutons that contain wheat and barley (you can make them from multigrain bread) salad dressing made from olive oil, balsamic vinegar and honey optional: goat cheese

Put all the fruit on a bed of lettuce and toss. Make sure to limit the number of the dates and grapes or it gets too sweet.

Add the dressing and croutons and toss again.

APRICOT-PISTACHIO MANDELBROT
Adapted from The Silver Palate Good Times Cookbook

3/4 cup dried chopped apricots
1 cup chopped pistachios
3 eggs
1/2 cup each granulated sugar, brown sugar
1/3 cup vegetable oil
1 1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
2 3/4 cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt

Heat oven to 350. Soak apricots in hot water until plump (30 minutes), and pat dry with paper towel. Toast pistachios on baking sheet in oven until aromatic, about 10 minutes. Cool.

Beat eggs and sugars in large bowl with mixer until light and fluffy. Add oil and vanilla.

Whisk flour, baking powder and salt together in another bowl; add to sugar mixture. Mix until blended, then stir in nuts and apricots.

Briefly knead dough on floured surface. Divide into two pieces. Firmly shape each piece into a log, 3 inches wide. Place logs on parchment paper-lined cookie sheet. Bake until golden, 30-35 minutes. Remove from oven; let stand until cool enough to handle.

Cut logs into slices on slight diagonal, 1/2- to 3/4-inch wide. Bake 10 minutes (longer if you like more crunch), turning cookies over after 5 minutes. Cool. Store wrapped in wax paper in a tin for up to one week. Or freeze, double-wrapped, as long as three months. Makes about 40.

Lawyer, 97, inducted into Order of Canada

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

Harry Walsh

WINNIPEG — Harry Walsh, one of Canada's greatest trial lawyers and in his prime a leader in Winnipeg's Jewish community, is one of the newest members of the Order of Canada.

The announcement of Walsh's induction, a long time coming considering that he is 97, was made Dec. 30.

"It was a complete surprise," said the honoree, "although my daughter, Ilene, knew about it. I have had dozens of congratulatory calls."

Walsh was recognized for "his dedication to criminal law in Canada for more than 70 years and for his advocacy against capital punishment."

He graduated from the University of Manitoba's School of Law in 1937. Over the years, Walsh served as counsel for thousands of criminal cases, including hundreds of murder cases. As chair of the Canadian Bar Association's criminal justice division, he led the campaign to abolish capital punishment in Canada.

Recognized for his dedication to criminal law in Canada for more than 70 years and for his advocacy against capital punishment

"We worked on the campaign for many years until we finally got results," he says.

Parliament finally abolished capital punishment in 1976, a year after Walsh and his committee persuaded the Canadian Bar Association to pass a resolution to that effect.

The other major highlight of Walsh's legal career was helping to establish Legal Aid Manitoba in the 1970s and recruiting senior people to work there.

In 2000, Walsh was named one of Manitoba's Top 10 lawyers of all time by the Law Society of Manitoba. He's a life bencher of the Law Society of Manitoba and a life member of the Canadian Bar Association.

In the Jewish community, Walsh's principal involvement has been with the Canadian Associates of the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev – Winnipeg was home to the first chapter in Canada – which he co-founded with his late wife, Irene. The chair in Jewish law and morality at Ben-Gurion University is named in his honour.

He notes that he supports most of Israel's other universities as well.

He was also one of the founders of the former Bnay Abraham Synagogue.

Despite his advanced years, he still puts in a full week of work at the office (where his son, Paul, is a partner) and still lives in his own home. "I don't work weekends," he said, "but I take files home with me to work on."

Giffords' Judaism noted in attacker's memo

JTA

TUCSON, Ariz. — In describing the motives of the man who allegedly attacked Gabrielle Giffords, a U.S. Department of Homeland Security memo reportedly notes that the Arizona congresswoman is Jewish.

The memo, obtained by Fox News Channel, says that the alleged assailant, Jared Lee Loughner, mentioned American Renaissance, an extremist anti-immigrant group, in some of his own postings.

"The group's ideology is anti-government, anti-immigration, anti-ZOG (Zionist occupational government), antisemitic," says the memo sent to law enforcement agencies. It also notes that Giffords, a Democrat, was the first Jewish congresswoman from Arizona.

Loughner was arrested after Giffords and at least 16 others were shot Saturday at a meet-your-lawmaker event at a Tucson shopping mall. Six people were killed, including a federal judge, John Roll, and Christina Taylor-Green, the nine-year-old granddaughter of former Mets and Yankees manager Dallas Green. Loughner was tackled and arrested. Giffords, a Democrat in her third term, remains in critical condition after being shot in the head.

Gabrielle Giffords

Loughner, who is being held by the FBI and has been described by authorities as "unstable," reportedly listed Mein Kampf and The Communist Manifesto as two of his favourite books, on his MySpace page. Several hours before the shooting he reportedly left a "Goodbye friends" message, which also said, "Please don't be mad at me."

Giffords was outside one of her signature "Congress at your corner" events outside a Safeway in Tucson, part of her congressional district, when the gunman approached and shot her. A Giffords staff member, Gabe Zimmerman, 30, the organizer of the event, was among the six casualties.

Dr. Michael Lemole a surgeon at the University Medical Center in Tucson said Sunday morning at a news conference that Giffords was responding to doctors' commands. During a two-hour surgery on Saturday, doctors removed bone fragments from her brain in order to help reduce swelling. The bullet went through the left side of her head, Lemole said.

Giffords was elected to Congress in the Democratic sweep in 2006. She made her Jewish identity part of her campaign.

"If you want something done, your best bet is to ask a Jewish woman to do it," Giffords, a former state senator, said at the time. "Jewish women – by our tradition and by the way we were raised – have an ability to cut through all the reasons why something should, shouldn't or can't be done, and pull people together to be successful."

Giffords, 40, was raised by a Christian Scientist mother and Jewish father, but said she decided she was Jewish following a visit to Israel in 2001. She attended services at a local Reform synagogue.

Giffords fought a hard re-election battle last year against the national anti-incumbent, anti-Democratic mood. She tacked to the right of her party on immigration, saying border security was of primary consideration.

The election was called in her favour weeks after the vote.

Giffords' office had been vandalized in March after she voted for health-care reform. Friends said she had received threats for her positions on health care and for opposing her state's new law allowing police to arrest undocumented immigrants during routine stops.

The National Jewish Democratic Council suggested that the heated rhetoric of the last year contributed to the climate that led to the attack.

"One suspect, now in custody, may be directly responsible for this crime," the group said in a statement. "But it is fair to say – in today's political climate and given today's political rhetoric – that many have contributed to the building levels of vitriol in our political discourse that have surely contributed to the atmosphere in which this event transpired."

Congresswoman known for her openness, Judaism

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — The event was typical Gabrielle Giffords: no barriers, all comers — Democrats, Republicans and independents welcome to talk about what was on their minds and in their hearts.

While she was deep in a conversation with an older couple about health care — the issue for which she was willing to risk her career —a gunman strode up to the Arizona congresswoman and shot her point blank in the head.

The critical wounding Jan. 8 of Giffords and the slaughter of six people standing near her — including a federal judge, her chief of community outreach and a nine-year-old girl interested in politics — brought to a screeching halt the easy, open ambience that typified Giffords' politics, friends and associates said.

"She's a warm person," Stuart Mellan, the president of the Jewish Federation of Southern Arizona, said as he walked away from a prayer service Saturday night at Temple Emanuel in Tucson, one of the southeastern Arizona cities that Giffords represents in Congress. "Everyone called her Gabby, and she would give a hug and remember your name."

Giffords was the president of a tire company founded by her grandfather when she was propelled into state politics, in part because of her concerns about the availability of health care. She switched her registration from Republican to Democrat, and in 2001, at 30, she was elected to the Arizona legislature.

She gained prominence quickly in that body, and in 2006, at 36, she became the first Jewish woman elected to Congress from her state.

At the same time, her Judaism was becoming more central to her identity. The turning point came in 2001 following a tour of Israel with the American Jewish Committee, she told the Arizona Star in 2007.

"It just cemented the fact that I wanted to spend more time with my own personal, spiritual growth. I felt very committed to Judaism," she said. "Religion means different things to different people. It provides me with grounding, a better understanding of who I came from."

Her wedding to Cmdr. Mark Kelly, an astronaut, was written up in the New York Times. The item noted that a mariachi band played Jewish music and there were two canopies – a chupah and one of swords held up by Kelly's navy buddies.

"That was Gabby," Jonathan Rothschild, a longtime friend who served on her campaign's executive committee, recalled to JTA. "The real irony of this thing is her Judaism is central to her, but she is the kind of person who reaches out to everybody."

Giffords' father is Jewish and her mother is a Christian Scientist, and she was raised in both faiths. Her grandfather, Akiba Hornstein, changed his name to Giffords after moving from New York to Arizona, in part because he did not want his Jewishness to be an issue in unfamiliar territory.

The women on her father's side of the family seemed to guide her toward identifying with Judaism.

"In my family, if you want to get something done, you take it to the Jewish women relatives," she told JTA in 2006. "Jewish women, by and large, know how to get things done."

Giffords, who last week took the oath of office for her third term in Congress, has pushed Jewish and pro-Israel issues to the forefront at the state and federal levels. She initiated an Arizona law facilitating Holocaust-era insurance claims for survivors, and in Congress she led an effort to keep Iran from obtaining parts for combat aircraft.

She didn't stint in seeking Jewish and pro-Israel funding. Nevada Democratic Representative Shelley Berkley, the premier pro-Israel lawmaker in Congress, fundraised for her, as did Steve Rabinowitz, the Washington public relations maven whose shop represents a slate of Jewish groups.

Giffords 'described as 'heimishe, down to earth'

"She was so heimishe, so down to earth," Rabinowitz, himself from Tucson, recalled of his fundraiser last spring.

Almost as soon as she was elected to the state legislature, Giffords was enmeshed in Arizona's signature issue — rights for undocumented immigrants — said Josh Protas, who directed the Tucson-area Jewish Community Relations Council for years before moving to Washington in 2009 to direct the D.C. office of the Jewish Council for Public Affairs.

Protas recalled meeting with Giffords as part of the area faith coalition promoting immigrant rights.

"We met with her around immigration issues, and she was sensitive to the faith community's concerns," he said.

Her approach to the issue was typical for the moderate Democrat, Protas said: she attempted to synthesize what she regarded as the valid viewpoints of both sides on the divisive issue.

"Understanding the complexities of the immigration situation was something important to her," he said. It came from "a sense of the Jewish value around how we treat the stranger, a history of the Jewish community – but she had recognition of the strong need for security."

It was a posture that led Giffords to hit both the state and federal governments last year. She blasted the Obama administration for not doing enough to secure the border, but also slammed as repressive a new Arizona law that allowed police to arrest undocumented immigrants during routine stops.

"She was very moderate in her views and willing to meet with folks on all sides," Protas said. "She took a lot of heat particularly the last couple of years from both the far right and the far left."

In the end, her greatest vulnerability might have been her openness.

The day Jim Kolbe said he was not seeking re-election to Congress, Giffords told Rothschild that she would run for the seat. Rothschild had one bit of advice for her: come back every weekend to meet constituents. Not hanging out with the locals had led to the defeat of Kolbe's Democratic predecessor.

He didn't need to convince her – she was back virtually every weekend.

And her open, engaging approach appeared to pay off.

Despite representing a swing district, she survived the Republican wave in November. And just three days before the shooting she was back in Washington – with one hand up and one hand on the Torah, grinning at her swearing-in at the Capitol.

Last Saturday, she was back in Tucson, at a parking lot smiling at all comers.

Jewish songwriter dies

JTA

Debbie Friedman, a popular singer and songwriter who is widely credited with reinvigorating synagogue music, has died.

Friedman died Sunday after being hospitalized in Southern California for several days with pneumonia. She was in her late 50s.

Debbie Friedman

"Debbie influenced and enriched contemporary Jewish music in a profound way," read a statement published Sunday on the website of the Union for Reform Judaism. "Her music crossed generational and denominational lines and carved a powerful legacy of authentic Jewish spirituality into our daily lives."

Friedman brought a more folksy, sing-along style to American congregations. In 2007 she was appointed to the faculty of the Reform movement's cantorial school in a sign that her style had gained mainstream acceptance.

She is best known for her composition Mi Shebeirach, a prayer for healing that is sung in many North American congregations.

Friedman released more than 20 albums and performed in sold-out concerts around the world at synagogues, churches, schools and prestigious venues such as Carnegie Hall. She received dozens of awards and was lauded by critics worldwide.

"Debbie Friedman was an extraordinary treasure of our movement and an individual of great influence," said Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union for Reform Judaism.

"Twenty-five years ago, North American Jews had forgotten how to sing. Debbie reminded us how to sing, she taught us how to sing. She gave us the vehicles that enabled us to sing. Then she impacted our youth and our camps and, ultimately, from there she impacted our synagogues.

"What happens in the synagogues of Reform Judaism today – the voices of song – are in large measure due to the insight, brilliance and influence of Debbie Friedman."

If they won't talk, we can't make peace, Israel says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – Israel urged the Palestinian leadership last week to set aside a diplomatic campaign that it says is keeping the Middle East peace process at an impasse and get back instead to direct talks.

"There is no doubt that the [peace] process is currently in an impasse," Israeli government spokesperson Mark Regev told BBC Radio in a London broadcast.

Mark Regev

"It's clear unfortunately that the Palestinian leadership has adopted a policy where they refuse to engage directly with Israel. And I would ask them" 'How do you expect to make peace with Israel unless you're willing to talk to Israel?' "

Regev said it was a "mirage" to think there was any alternative to a negotiated peace agreement.

But chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said talks with Israel, which stalled three months ago with the expiry of an Israeli moratorium on settlement building in the occupied West Bank, were at a dead end and other options would be pursued.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Among them is a diplomatic drive to win recognition of Palestinian statehood from as many UN member states as possible. Brazil, Argentina and several other Latin American states recently accorded recognition to Palestine.

"We don't need negotiations anymore," said Erekat, adding that the process has been going on for 17 years since the interim Oslo accords of 1993.

"Now it's time for decisions, and the decisions are required from leaders," he said. The terms of reference for an eventual peace accord should be set by the Quartet of powers engaged in the process – the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, Erekat added.

"Secondly, we want the [UN] Security Council to seek a second resolution concerning the Israeli continued settlement activity, asking for a freeze so we can continue the negotiations," he said.

Such a resolution could go to the Security Council later this month, according to Palestinian reports.

Thirdly, said Erekat, "We are requesting from the nations, on air, to accept the state of Palestine of '67 - that's what we're trying to achieve."

Regev said a unilateral move by the Palestinians would not serve the cause of a genuine peace deal to end the 62-year-old conflict and settle all claims.

"It was two decades ago, in 1988, that Yasser Arafat declared an independent Palestinian state and he got countries – Third-World countries, Communist countries, others – to recognize that state and I would ask the Palestinians what did that recognition give them? Did it change anything on the ground?" he said.

More than 100 countries have recognized a Palestinian state. But the mere fact of recognition has had scant impact on the continuing conflict. Palestinian officials nevertheless say they hope Chile will add its name to the list soon and are hoping Mexico will do the same later this year.

Their ultimate goal is not yet clear, but the Palestinian leadership would like to see a majority of UN members on their side by the next UN General Assembly next September.

Israel warns that any renewed unilateral declaration of statehood in the absence of a negotiated treaty would be a highly counter-productive move.

"My prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, has said publicly that he is willing to do another freeze [on settlements], but he said it cannot be in a vacuum," Regev said.

"In other words, we are asking for give and take. We are asking for the peace process to be a two-way street and I ask the Palestinians: 'What are you willing to give to make this process succeed?' "

Quartet envoy Tony Blair says suspended peace talks, whether direct or indirect, must get back on track very soon.

"I think it's measured in weeks not months," he told the BBC program. "We've got to give shape to the negotiation... we've got to try and see: Okay, we agree on the principle of the two-state solution, but what does that really mean?"

Israel Briefs

Sharon in coma five years

Former Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon remains in a coma five years after suffering a massive stroke. He is hospitalized at the Sheba Medical Center of Tel Hashomer Hospital in Tel Aviv and has returned home for weekend visits.

Hamas leader: Shoah a 'lie'

A top Hamas leader called the Holocaust a "lie." "The lie according to which they were a victim of a holocaust and the [Jewish] people are a victim – this lie has crumbled with the holocaust of Beit Hanun, the holocaust of Al-Fakhura and the other countless holocausts... committed by the Zionist enemy," AFP, the French news agency, quoted Mahmoud Zahar as saying last week. Zahar was listing incidents in the Gaza War two years ago and marking the second anniversary of the landing of an Israeli shell near Al-Fakhura, a school run by the UN Relief and Works Agency in the Jabaliya refugee camp. Hamas claims 43 people, all but one of them civilians, were killed in the incident; Israel's army concluded 12 people, nine of them combatants, were killed, and that its troops were returning fire.

Apology for killing wrong man

Israel's army apologized for killing a civilian in his bed. Troops shot Amr Qawasme in his Hebron home during a raid aimed at re-arresting six suspected terrorists who had been released the day before by the Palestinian Authority. Qawasme, 65, lived a floor above the intended target, Wael Mahmoud Said Bitar, the army said. Bitar, who was implicated in a suicide bombing in Dimona in 2008, was arrested in the raid.

More Birthright funds

Israel will more than double its investment in the popular Birthright Israel program. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu made the announcement before 3,000 program participants in Jerusalem last week. "My government will give more than double its investment in Birthright, and over the next few years we will invest more than $100 million in Birthright. Together with private donations, we can increase the number of [participants] to 50,000 a year," Netanyahu said. Considered one of the most successful initiatives in the Jewish world, Birthright Israel provides free 10-day trips to Israel for Jewish young adults aged 18-26. Some 30,000 people take part in the program each year. More than 250,000 have participated since its inception in 2000 through the joint initiative of philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt.

Knesset to probe groups

Israel's Knesset voted to form a parliamentary committee to investigate left-wing Israeli groups that criticize the Israeli military's actions. The initiative, proposed by the Yisrael Beiteinu Party, passed by a vote of 47 to 16. The committee will be charged with determining if the groups are funded by foreign countries or by groups with links to terrorism. Israeli human rights groups have criticized the move. State Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein ruled last summer that groups can't be investigated for criticizing Israel Defence Forces activities. Some of the groups singled out during the discussion included Yesh Din, Machsom Watch, B'tselem, Adallah and Breaking the Silence.

Parenting tips from Dr. Jeff

By RENA GODFREY
Special to the CJN

Is my kid eating enough? Will he be taller than my short hubby? Is screaming good for my baby's lungs? Does teething cause fever?

Dr. Jeff Weisbrot (better known as Dr. Jeff), pediatrician for over 20 years, teacher, lecturer, musician and now author, tapped into the many questions parents ask at his Richmond Hill, Ont., office and wrote Should I Worry? Pediatric Tips for Parents. It's a humorous, tell-all book intended to guide parents through the early years of their child's development.

What started as a creative outlet for the doctor became 75 chapters covering everything from choosing a pediatrician to dispelling old wives' tales, intermingled with personal stories, poems and Yiddish references.

Should I Worry? is sure to entertain, from its first-time mother's mantra: "I just had a baby and I don't know what I'm doing. Om," to a Dr. Seuss-inspired poem: "When Little Miss Sned Would Not Go to Bed."

"The book is designed to make you smile and laugh out loud," Weisbrot says.

Should I Worry? is divided into four parts – What is Normal?, How to Parent, When to Worry and Where We're Heading – a compilation of songs, sayings, jokes and more. His "pediatric pearls " of wisdom offer a fresh perspective on different issues and are generally found at the end of each chapter.

For Weisbrot, who grew up in Toronto and was raised, he says, on a healthy dose of Mad Magazine, writing the book was both therapeutic and a tremendous amount of fun.

Weisbrot chose the title, Should I Worry?, because this is the most common question he hears. He believes that when parents ask him if they should worry, they are actually asking him for permission to worry.

"Parents often ask me if it's okay to feel a certain way regarding their child's behaviour or illness. The word 'should' implies there is a right or wrong way to feel, and there are no rights or wrongs when it comes to parents' feelings."

Should I Worry? explores some of those uncertain feelings that parents have and provides valuable tips on how to handle difficult situations.

Still, Weisbrot says, "the best advice is no advice.

"Having children is an exploration of self-discovery. What parents need is to be informed and empowered to believe that what they're doing is the right thing."

Should I Worry? is available at www.shouldiworry.ca and is sold at the York Central Hospital Gift Shop in Richmond Hill, Ont.

Israel: a natural gas superpower

By YOSEF TASTASSA
Special to The CJN

Until not long ago, it seemed that Israel would rely on foreign energy sources forever. The fact that a tiny nation surrounded by hostile neighbours had no natural energy resources was very disturbing, both economically and strategically.

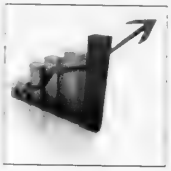
Israelis used to say, cynically, that whenever others dug a hole in the neighbourhood, they found oil or natural gas, but whenever they dug a hole in their own yard, they found mud and salty water.

The sad fact is that continuously increasing energy prices have been a burden on the Israeli economy. It's also a fact that Israel must hold enough oil reserves to sustain itself during a military conflict.

Advanced geological surveys conducted in the deep waters off the Israeli coast at the beginning of the century showed that there was a high probability of finding oil and natural gas in Israeli sovereign waters.

The first natural gas well was discovered in the Mediterranean Sea northwest of Ashkelon, and the natural gas has been flowing to Israel for several years.

The Tamar natural gas field is located about 90 kilometres west of the port city of Haifa. It was a very significant discovery for Israel. In July 2009, Texas-based Noble Energy, one of the partners in the Tamar exploration corporation, reported that Tamar's capacity is nearly 7.3 trillion cubic feet (TCF), enough to support the energy needs of the State of Israel for nearly four decades. Noble also estimated the economic value of Tamar at $6.7 billion.



Leviathan – a mighty whale in the Mediterranean

The real thriller in the Israeli energy sector, however, is not Tamar but Leviathan. In the past, geologists estimated that the chances of finding natural gas at the site, 135 kilometres west of Haifa, were 50 per cent. The estimates also said Leviathan is twice the size of Tamar, if not more.

After a period of great expectation and waiting, the moment of truth arrived. The Sedco Express, a drilling rig, hired in Spain by Noble, arrived on Oct. 12 and started immediately with experimental drilling into the core of the potential well.

At the beginning of this month, nearly three months after drilling started, the Leviathan partnership announced that the findings are positive and that Leviathan's estimated capacity is at least 16 TCF, with a potential value of $45 to $90 billion, depending on final drilling results. As well, there is a 17 per cent chance of finding three billion barrels of oil in a deeper layer of the Leviathan field.

As a result, Israel will not only be able to supply its own energy needs, it may also become a major energy exporter in the region.

The effect on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange

The Leviathan partners are Noble (with a 39.66 per cent stake) and the Israeli firms Delek Energy (22.67 per cent), Avner Oil Exploration (22.67 per cent) and Ratio Oil Exploration (15 per cent).

A brief look at Ratio's share price hints at the potential significance of the find. In November 2009, Ratio shares were trading at 1.7 cents each. By January 2010, the share price was 3.5 cents. Last week, Ratio traded at more than 15.3 cents per share, surging 900 per cent in 15 months.

The effect on the Israeli economy

Israeli leaders were surprised by the offshore energy finds and decided to re-examine taxation policy pertaining to natural resources. Eytan Sheshinski, an economics professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, was nominated to chair a committee that would make recommendations on taxing policy to the state. Sheshinski's recommendations were published earlier this month. They suggested that the state's long-term share from taxes should be 55 to 62 per cent of the profits, subject to government and Knesset approvals.

Once Tamar gas reaches the coast of Israel and Leviathan gas is exported, the yearly contribution to Israel's economy will be no less than $5 billion.

Lebanon's appeal to the UN

Lebanon, with the support of the terrorist militia Hezbollah, has requested that the United Nations draw the nautical border between Israel and Lebanon. Lebanon also claimed that Leviathan is located in Lebanese territorial waters. The UN rejected the Lebanese claims, saying it does not draw nautical borders. The Leviathan discovery may yet bring another conflict in the region.

Israel to use gas income to retire external debt

By AVI BAR-ELI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's future revenue from the sale of oil and natural gas won't be included in the regular state budget, but instead be put into a special fund. The decision was based on an understanding reached by the government after preliminary discussions over how to distribute the state's share of the revenue from oil and gas exploration.

According to the model taking shape, royalty and tax payments from the sale of oil and gas would be directed first to cover a portion of Israel's external debt. In addition, the state would establish a special fund whose assets would ultimately be invested abroad.

The arrangement is an effort to avoid the so-called Dutch disease, a reference to the aftermath of the discovery of natural gas off the coast of the Netherlands in the 1960s. The country experienced a sharp rise in its currency at the time, the guilder, after a rush of incoming foreign money. This caused a sharp rise in the value of the guilder, which made Dutch exports less competitive while the price of imports fell. Local industry was hurt and unemployment rose, accompanied by a rise in public debt and inflation.

According to the Sheshinski Committee, which recently submitted its recommendations on government royalty and tax policy for natural resource exploitation, the offshore Tamar gas exploration site alone could generate average annual government revenues of $550 to $830 billion for the next 30 years. The revenue would result from 11 per cent royalties from the site, along with a progressive tax levy of 20 per cent to 50 per cent on partnership profits.

Although Israel's external debt is currently $30 billion and revenues from Tamar are expected to be small in comparison to the country's gross domestic product of about $220 billion, the thinking in the government is still that the revenues should be earmarked for a special fund, on the assumption that Tamar revenue will be followed by state revenue from other exploration sites that ultimately could have a significant impact on the balance of payments.

In the course of the Sheshinski Committee proceedings, consultants were asked to create an information database on how other countries with natural resources have dealt with the issue. Among the examples considered was the Singapore government's investment fund for its surplus income. The fund manages assets of $330 billion and employs about 1,000 people around the world.

The Norwegian model was also looked at. Norway's fund is managed as a unit of the country's central bank and has a whopping $600 billion in assets in a variety of sectors.

The committee also examined the concept of a stabilization fund designed to counter fluctuations in state revenue caused by sharp changes from natural resource sales. Such funds exist in Chile, for example, due to the volatility of the price of copper, and in Russia.

Israeli reporter makes heartwarming documentary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nearly four years ago, like a bolt out of the blue, Israeli television reporter Shlomi Eldar received an e-mail message from Dr. Raz Somech, a physician at Tel Aviv's Tel Hashomer Hospital.

The message had an urgent edge to it. One of his patients, Mohammed Abu Mustafa, a four-month-old Palestinian boy from the Gaza Strip born without an immune system, would die unless he was given a bone marrow transplant, an expensive procedure not available in Gaza. Dr. Somech suggested that a story by Eldar might help him raise funds for the $55,000 transplant operation.

Eldar, a Channel 10 Arab affairs reporter who had filed stories from Gaza until its violent takeover by Hamas in the summer of 2007, doubted whether a story on a dying Arab infant would resonate with viewers.

"I was not that keen," admitted Eldar, the author of Eyeless in Gaza, a book that warned of Hamas' growing power in Gaza, from which Israel withdrew in 2005. "I didn't think it would be an interesting story."

Nonetheless, Eldar decided to proceed, interviewing the boy's mother and father, Raida and Fauzi Abu Mustafa. On the day his piece aired, the southern Israeli town of Sderot was hit by a volley of Hamas rockets.

Much to Eldar's surprise, his clip resonated with callers. One caller, a man whose son had been killed in the line of duty as a soldier, donated the amount required for the transplant procedure to go ahead.

Astounded by the turn of events, Eldar decided to make a heartwarming documentary about the race to save Mohammed. Precious Life, which was screened at at the Jerusalem Film Festival last July and at the Toronto International Film Festival several months later, opened in Toronto last week.

"It got an amazing reception in Israel," said Eldar in an interview last September. "Its achievement is that it humanized the Palestinians of Gaza."

Eldar, 53, encountered no shortage of problems in making Precious Life, which is due to be broadcast by HBO in June.

For starters, Raida Abu Mustafa, a traditional Palestinian woman who was hostile to Israel, declined to cooperate. Her husband, who comes across in the film as a reasonable person, convinced her to talk.

Eldar also found it hard to raise funds for the film, his first, which eventually cost $250,000. "To some people, it seemed like a banal story."

Undeterred by rejections, Eldar kept filming, acting as his own cinematographer. In 2008, he finally struck paydirt. Ehud Bleiberg, an Israeli producer who heads a Los Angeles-based production company and whose credits include Tel Aviv Stories, agreed to fund Eldar's documentary.

Channel 2, a private Israeli TV station, also contributed funds.

During filming, another snag popped up. After Raida Abu Mustafa told him she intended to raise Mohammed as a suicide bomber, Eldar was tempted to quit. "Her husband begged me to continue," he recalled.

After considering the matter for a month, Eldar returned to the project. By then, Raida Abu Mustafa had moderated her views, promising not to raise Mohammed as a shahid and coming out in favour of a two-state solution to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict.

To his relief, Raida Abu Mustafa and her family liked Precious Life. "They cried during the screening. She said, 'We were friends, but now we are brothers.' "

Despite Israel's blockade of Gaza, Eldar keeps in touch with them via Skype and e-mail.

"I'm like a member of their family," said Eldar, who began covering Gaza during the first Palestinian uprising in the late 1980s.

Shlomi Eldar

With Hamas' seizure of Gaza, Israeli reporters were forced to leave. "I can't argue with this decision," said Eldar, who currently covers the West Bank and co-ordinates coverage of Gaza through a team of local Palestinian journalists.

In spite of the restrictions, Eldar managed to sneak into Gaza in December 2008, when Israel's three-week war with Hamas broke out. But after 10 hours, he had to leave. Eldar, who lives in Nes Ziona, a 45-minute drive from Gaza, covered the war from Israel.

He was the reporter who broke the emotionally searing story of a Palestinian doctor and peace advocate, Izzeldin Abuelaish, who lost three of his daughters after an errant Israeli artillery shell crashed into his house on the outskirts of a Palestinian refugee camp. Eldar, who considers Abuelaish a close friend, claimed this highly embarrassing incident prompted then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert to call a halt to the war.

He also argues that Israel deployed disproportionate force in waging the war. But he disagrees with the Goldstone report's claim that Israel committed war crimes or, possibly, crimes against humanity, in Gaza.

Eldar, who is currently writing a book about Hamas, doubts whether an Israeli rapprochement with Hamas is attainable. But a long-term truce with Hamas, involving the release of kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, is possible if Israel releases a sufficient number of Hamas prisoners, he said.

Eldar is pleased that a movie theatre in Jenin – the former suicide capital of the West Bank – wants to screen Precious Life. It is a sign that normality is returning to the West Bank after two Palestinian uprisings, he noted. But he doubts whether Precious Life will ever see the light of day in Gaza, at least as long as Hamas runs the coastal strip.

Ethiopian refugee's story

The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company is bringing the Nephesh Theatre production One of a Kind from Israel for just two performances to the Jane Mallet Theatre in Toronto.

One of a Kind is co-writer Yossi Vassa's own personal account of his journey out of Ethiopia to a refugee camp in Sudan before flying to Jerusalem, as part of the Operation Moses airlift.

Vassa stars in this moving tale that follows a 10-year-old boy and his family as they travel on foot almost 700 kilometres from northern Ethiopia to Sudan.

Vassa is now a popular actor and comedian in Israel. He co-wrote and directed this play with Shai Ben Attar.

One of a Kind runs Feb. 24 at 7:30 p.m. There's also a limited-seating student matinée at 1:15 p.m. For tickets, call 416-366-7723.

St. Thomas synagogue is a historic landmark

By MERLE ROSENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I used to think that a Caribbean vacation was all sun, fun and relaxation. But on a recent trip to the U.S. Virgin Islands, I learned that there is so much more.

On the flight to St. Thomas, an ad from Chabad Lubavitch of the Virgin Islands caught my attention. It read: "Enjoy an elegant Shabbat dinner in a unique and intimate setting, overlooking the sparkling turquoise waters of St. Thomas... Dine on traditional Shabbat delicacies, with flavours of the Caribbean woven throughout the menu, complemented by a selection of kosher wines".

Even though I was to leave St. Thomas on Friday afternoon and would miss Shabbat dinner, I felt compelled to learn more about the history and community of Jews on the U.S. Virgin Islands (USVI).

The U.S. Virgin Islands, part of the Lesser Antilles near Puerto Rico, comprise 50 islands. The three main islands – St. Croix, St. John and St. Thomas – share a fascinating history, unsurpassed tropical beauty and a rich living culture.

Jews first came to the Caribbean around 1654, fleeing Spanish and Portuguese religious intolerance. In 1655, Jewish merchants settled in USVI, then called the Danish West Indies and ruled by Denmark, where Jews and Catholics were granted religious freedom. With only nine families as members, the first synagogue was built in St. Thomas in 1796. The present synagogue, built in 1833, is the oldest synagogue in continuous use under the U.S. flag.

The interior of the St. Thomas synagogue

The St. Thomas Synagogue, or Beracha Veshalom Vegmiluth Hasidim, is located in charming Charlotte Amalie, the capital and largest city of USVI. Built in the Sephardi style, the synagogue was declared a national historic landmark in 1997. I was amazed by the light airy atmosphere of the sanctuary with its vaulted ceilings and white sand floor, reminiscent of the Marranos or "secret Jews," who practised Judaism in cellars and used sand to muffle the sounds of prayer. And the seven-branch menorah dating back to the 11th century, lamps made of Baccarat crystal, and pews and Ark made of local mahogany are simply gorgeous.

According to the Chabad Lubavitch's Rabbi Asher Federman, there are approximately 800 Jews living in USVI year-round and about 1,000 Jews own time-shares and winter homes. The St. Thomas congregation and Chabad Lubavitch reach out to Jewish visitors for bnei mitzvahs, weddings, minyans, Shabbat dinners and daily prayers, and provide information on where to find kosher food.

"This year, at a menorah lighting ceremony at the Westin hotel in St. John, there were 150 Jewish visitors and [locals]," Rabbi Federman said. "We have 30 to 40 people [a mix of locals and tourists] at our Shabbat table every week and community parties with anywhere from 50 to 150 locals joining, depending on the season."

Mina Orenstein, formerly of London, Ont., and now a longtime St. Thomas resident and a member of the St. Thomas Synagogue, said the shul has a close-knit congregation, which has developed through shared celebrations of Shabbat and Jewish holidays and meeting common challenges such as power outages and storms.

"The quality and inclusiveness of the congregation is not easily found. In 215 years, we have never missed a Shabbat service, even when fewer than 25 families lived on the island," Orenstein said.

The synagogue in St. Thomas

A testament to the strength of the Jewish community in USVI will be the celebration in 2011 of two "heritage" bnei mitzvah – the bnei mitzvah of children whose parents were born and raised on St. Thomas or St. John.

For information on destination weddings and bnei mitzvah, Shabbat dinner and services at St. Thomas Synagogue, contact Rabbi Stephen Moch, hebrewcong@islands.vi or 340-774-4312.

For information on minyans, daily prayers, Shabbat dinner and services, contact Rabbi Asher Federman, Chabad Lubavitch Jewish Center, at info@jewishvirginislands.com or 340-998-8889.

AMERICAN PIANIST VICTOR GOLDBERG NAMED 'AMBASSADOR' FOR ISRAEL

U.S.-based Israeli musician Victor Goldberg was recently named "Israel ambassador" on the official website of the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Goldberg is in the midst of an Asian tour that has inspired glowing reviews on the heels of the rave reviews he received on his Carnegie Hall debut last April.

Goldberg is accustomed to gleaming grand pianos, so when an electronic keyboard was scrounged up for him to play at a Buddhist orphanage in Mandalay, the second-largest city in Myanmar (Burma), he adapted quickly to the challenge. "I couldn't play most of my pieces on such a small keyboard, so I played two works by Mozart and Tchaikovsky," he said. Even so, the 6,000 children and their teachers at his performance "were awe-struck and demanded more," according to a local newspaper.

Goldberg's months-long tour of the Far East began in China and, with the help of various Israeli embassies, has also included dates in the Philippines and Thailand.

Gangsta rapper embraces Chassidism

JTA

JERUSALEM — It was early on during his difficult, isolated years in prison that the former gangsta rapper known as Shyne decided to formally take on the laws of Judaism as his own.

Shyne, who changed his name in prison from Jamaal Barrows to Moses Levi, remembers the initial skepticism he encountered from prison rabbis he met at New York's Riker's Island, where he was incarcerated.

"In prison culture, everyone is trying to make a scam, everyone is a con artist, so who is this dark-skinned guy they wondered? Does he just want the Jewish food?" asks Levi, now cloaked in the black garb of a Chassidic Jew and living in Jerusalem.

"A guy with payes? Maybe they might believe him," he says, laughing.

Levi, 32, a former protegée of the hip-hop mogul Sean Combs (a.k.a. P. Diddy), found himself drawn to Judaism ever since hearing Old Testament stories from his grandmother as a boy. He was with Combs and then-girlfriend Jennifer Lopez, the singer and movie star, the night of a 1999 shooting at a Manhattan nightclub that left three injured and resulted in a trial that became a media circus.

Combs was acquitted, but Levi was found guilty of opening fire in the nightclub. In 2001, he was sentenced to 10 years in prison. After serving nearly nine years he was released last year.

Levi credits Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, one of his attorneys, with helping him gain access in prison to prayer books and other religious items such as a tallit and tfillin.

Now, as he walks through the alleyways of Jerusalem's Old City on his way to the Western Wall, he clutches a worn prayer book whose maroon leather cover was torn off by prison officials for security purposes.

Adhering to an Orthodox approach to Judaism made the most sense to him, said Levi, who is studying with several haredi Orthodox rabbis from some of the most stringent yeshivas in Jerusalem. A few months ago, Levi said, he underwent a type of conversion called a "giyur l'chumra" – a conversion usually for those who likely are Jewish but undergo conversion "just to be on the safe side."

Shyne in Jerusalem

Levi's great-grandmother was Ethiopian, and he thinks she may have been Jewish. Exploring his possible Ethiopian Jewish heritage intrigues him.

Levi feels as if he's returning to the fold. His days are spent in study and prayer. Reminders of his newly acquired Jewish education come out in his rapid fire, Brooklyn-accented speech smattered with Hebrew words and talmudic and biblical references.

Levi is an anomaly in more ways than one.

His father is a prosperous lawyer who currently is the prime minister of Belize. When Levi was a child, his mother took him to the United States. They settled in New York, where she worked as a house cleaner to support them.

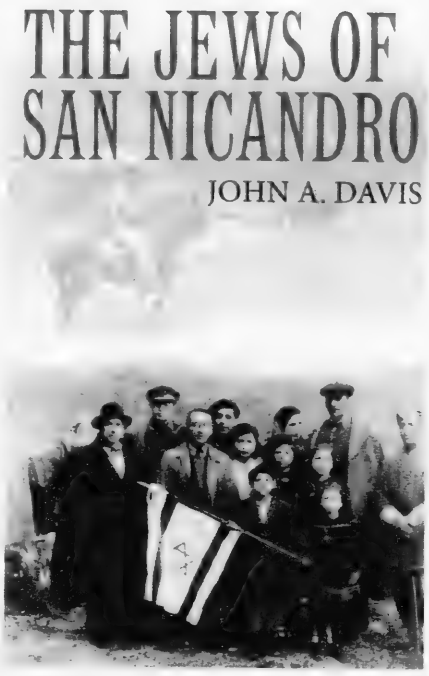
But Levi soon was enamoured with life on the streets, becoming a gang member. He was in and out of trouble, and at the age of 13, he was sent away to a juvenile centre. By the age of 15, he had been shot.

These days, Levi is talking about a musical comeback. He plans to release two albums this spring that are part of a joint venture with Def Jam Records, the major hip-hop label. Gone is some of the harsher and misogynist language of his previous two albums, one of which came out while he was in jail. While not explicitly religious, the lyrics do have a spiritual bent.

In Jerusalem, where Levi says he plans to stay for the next few months, he appears nonplussed by the second glances he attracts. But as a black man in the clothes of a haredi – complete with long black wool coat, fedora, knickers and black ribbed socks – Levi indeed stands out.

From Catholic mass to mass conversion

By SHALOM GOLDMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.



In the spring of 1932, the chief rabbi of Rome, Angelo Sacerdoti, sent a letter to Donato Manduzio, of the small town of San Nicandro in Italy's poverty-stricken southeastern Apulia region. Rome's rabbi had heard reports a year earlier about a group of Catholic villagers who wanted to convert to Judaism. And soon afterward, he had received a letter of inquiry from Manduzio, their leader.

Apulia was remote from Rome and from the other centres of Jewish life in Italy, and there had been no Jewish community in the region since the 15th century. Who then, the rabbi wondered, were these aspiring converts to Judaism? He wrote to Manduzio to find out.

At the time, in the early 1930s, there were approximately 50,000 Jews in all of Italy. Over the previous century, many Jews had converted to Catholicism, and many more were to convert before the decade was over. But a group of Catholic converts to Judaism? This was unheard of. Especially striking was the rumour that these aspiring converts in a small village were now keeping the Sahbath as best they could.

The story of Manduzio's followers and their conversion to Judaism – and eventually to fully realized Zionism – is the subject of John Davis' The Jews of San Nicandro (Yale University Press). Davis, a respected historian of modern Italy, does a fine job here of giving the reader the wider Italian historical context of this story.

After first hearing of these "Sabbatini" (Sabbath-observers), Rabbi Sacerdoti had learned that they "discovered" Judaism (or more precisely, the religion of the Hebrew Bible, without any knowledge of the Oral Law) on their own. Protestant missionaries had distributed Italian translations of the Bible in many southern Italian towns, and a considerable number of Catholic villagers had joined Protestant churches, much to the consternation of the local Catholic clergy.

The San Nicandro villagers, under Manduzio's visionary leadership, came to the conclusion that the message of the "Old Testament" was the only true divine message, and that they should completely reject Christian teachings.

Rome's rabbi was alarmed by this development, concerned that a group conversion would antagonize the Catholic Church.

Rabbi Sacerdoti was amazed at the Sabbatini's expression of interest in Judaism. No doubt he would have been astounded to know that Manduzio and his followers (who in 1932, numbered 20 adults and 30 children) would later convert to Judaism and that it would take 15 years for this to happen. Even more astonishing by the standards of the early 1930s, was the fact that most of the 50 Sabbatini would become Israelis – a term that was then only a distant dream.

Rabbi Sacerdoti, who died in 1935, did not live to see the outcome of the San Nicandro saga. But his successors did. They were each involved, to a greater or lesser extent, in the San Nicandro conversion story.

Over the tumultuous period from 1932 to 1946, Rabbi Sacerdoti and his successors tried to discourage the villagers from converting to Judaism. Perhaps, suggested one of Manduzio's Jewish correspondents in the mid-1930s, the group should remain gentile and embrace the responsibilities of "the sons of Noah."

Manduzio's spirited response to this suggestion showed that the group's self-concept had changed in the five years that had passed since his own first "revelation."

"We were amazed to hear that we are not sons of Israel," Manduzio wrote. "We know by Divine Revelation that we are more than Israelites, we are descended from the third branch of Jacob and directly from Levi."

Not content to claim the moral high ground by invoking a Levitical lineage, Manduzio then made a claim that must have astounded all of the rabbis. He said he and his followers were closer to the "real" Jewish tradition than his Jewish interlocutors, particularly the rabbis: "If you say that we are outside Israel, then this is a sign that you do not recognize the Divine Revelation with which we alone have been favoured."

Neither he nor his followers, Manduzio acknowledged, had "studied at rabbinical college or was a rabbi, because everything we know has been taught to us by the one God who is the only teacher and shepherd."

In August 1946, the San Nicandro Sabbatini underwent conversion to Judaism, and in November 1949, most of those converts sailed from the southern Italian city of Bari to Haifa and settled in Moshav Alma, near Safed, from where they dispersed to other parts of the country during the following decade, many of them to the Be'er Sheva region.

Davis does a fine job of telling the story of the San Nicandrans. As a historian of modern Italy, he focuses on the political and social aspects of the story. But students and scholars of religion may want to learn more about the ritual and spiritual lives of these converts, and Davis' account is a bit sparse on these details.

In addition, a more analytical account of Manduzio's opposition to the rabbinic tradition would have enlarged the scope of the book. These aspects will no doubt be covered in subsequent books on the San Nicandran converts. As of now, we have John Davis and Yale University Press to thank for bringing this great story to light.

MONTREAL — Ariel Helwani doesn't make it back to Montreal that much anymore, except for maybe the Jewish holidays.

But the 28-year-old native, who is in the process of making it big in mixed martial arts (MMA) broadcasting, did visit recently to cover a match between Quebecer George St. Pierre and Josch Koschek.

As things turned out, St. Pierre won – before a crowd of 23,000.

But Helwani has won his share, too. Last year, he was named MMA journalist of the year, which is considered not too shabby for an ambitious, sports-obsessed guy whose poise, professionalism, and polish on radio, TV and on online mixed martial arts websites have gotten him more YouTube hits and Twitter followers than any other reporter in the industry.

"It's been cool, that's for sure, being recognized," said Helwani in a recent telephone interview.

Helwani grew up in TMR and Westmount, attended the Akiva School and Herzliah High School, and has fond memories of growing up a local sports fanatic.

For the uninitiated, mixed martial arts is a full-contact combat sport that allows competitors – through both striking and grappling – to use a variety of martial and non-martial disciplines such as boxing, Brazilian jiujitsu and others.

It is all pretty intense, full of showmanship, and violent – and controversial – and a sport that once, like Rodney Dangerfield, got no respect. Before becoming safer and more regulated through its promotion company called Ultimate Fighting Championship (UFC), founded in 1993, critics considered it barbaric. Senator John McCain likened it to "human cock fighting," and it is still illegal in six U.S. states, including, most prominently, New York.

Mixed martial arts is banned in several Canadian provinces. But Helwani is sure it's only a matter of time before that will all change.

The Ontario government recently announced that it would allow mixed martial arts starting this year.

Since becoming more regulated, "it is safer than boxing," Helwani said, and has recorded very few serious injuries. "People say its appeal is based on 'blood lust,' and it's true people like violence, but that is not its main appeal.

"People always called boxing the "sweet science," but it is just as violent [as MMA] and was never banned."

And unlike pro wrestling, which it is often compared to because of its showmanship, winners are not decided in advance, which accounts, Helwani thinks, for its huge fan appeal.

"The fans just love it, and it is slowly but surely getting the respect it deserves," he said, pointing to the fact that conventional sports broadcasters such as ESPN and TSN now include coverage of UFC matches.

Certainly, Helwani, now residing in Manhattan's Upper East Side with his wife, Jacqueline Stein, is living a lifelong fantasy come true.

Growing up a huge fan of sports legends Marv Albert and Bob Costa, Helwani used to watch professional wrestling and other sports on pay per view and, at age 11, fell in love with mixed martial arts when he saw his first UFC match in 1993, the year it was founded.

His uncle, David Saad, competed in judo for Lebanon at the 1976 Olympics in Montreal.

Bent on becoming a sports broadcast journalist, Helwani earned a 2004 degree in broadcast journalism at Syracuse University's S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communication, and little by little made his way up the broadcasting sports rungs.

His CV now includes working for HBO Sports, ESPN Classic and Spike TV, MMA-fighting.com, Versus.com, hosting AOL's The MMA Hour and co-hosting XM Radio's Fight Club.

Helwani has also covered conventional sports such as the 2010 Winter Olympics, the NBA and NFL drafts, and the Stanley Cup playoffs.

In a sense, Helwani suggested, mixed martial arts is still in a nascent but rapidly developing state. Despite roots dating back to ancient Greece, the UFC is only 17 years old and is continuing to mature, with mixed martial arts becoming safer, more mainstream, and is in effect still a "small community" that "I am proud to be a part of."

"That is why I love being part of MMA," he told an MMA website fullmount.co last year. "I feel that we get to be there at a time when it still hasn't hit the mainstream and get the chance to grow with the sport professionally as a journalist.

"It's not just us – the fighters and everyone involved with the sport get to grow, too."

Stars of David win multicultural hockey tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

With the score 2-0 after two, it was still recognizable hockey. But when the Israeli Stars of David notched the third goal in the third period, the nonsense really began.

The game now appearing out of hand, the Irish Shamrocks went "Flyers" on them – or rather the 1970s version of the team. Shades of Dave "the Hammer" Schultz. One player ran the Stars' goalie. Shades of Ron Hextall, the Shamrocks' netminder skated the length of the ice to get in on the action.

A penalty parade ensued, but Alex Voihanski had coached his young team to maintain discipline and stick to what they do best: skate hard, get the puck in deep, cycle it and go forward, forward, forward. Sort of like the Montreal Canadiens of the same era. And just as that version of the Habs came out on top when it went head to head with the Broad Street Bullies, so too did the Stars of David.

Riding Kevin Kliman's shutout goaltending, the Stars defeated the Shamrocks 3-0 to capture the 2010 Scotiabank Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships.

The win marks the second time in three years the Stars have captured the prestigious title. In 2008, their first victory came as something of a surprise, but that was not the case this time, Voihanski said.

"The first year, it was shocking to spectators that we won. The spectators now expect us to be one of the better teams."

Voihanski, who played in the MTHL for many years and who lives and breathes hockey, put together a lineup that focused on youth, speed and skill. He assembled a "Kid Line" of teenagers Bryan Weinberg, who plays for Mississauga Chargers of the OHA, Jesse Schwartz, also with the Chargers, and Daniel Leavens of Newmarket Hurricanes.

His veteran line was centred by tournament MVP Alon Eizenman, who played for the Israeli national team and in the French professional league, team captain and ex-Plymouth Whaler Stacey Britstone and Adam Weinberg, Bryan's brother, who played for the University of Toronto.

Others included Jordan Weinberg, the third brother who shifted between forward and defence, and Mike Pain, who played for Sarnia in the OHL and for York University.

Despite little prep time, the Stars came out the gate flying, defeating the Hellenic Lightning 6-1.

Game 2 saw the Stars "come out a little flat," admitted Voihanski. They tied the Macedonian Lions 1-1, despite gaining momentum midway through the second period. "We were all over them, but we couldn't beat their goalie," Voihanski said.

Game 3 versus the Irish Shamrocks was a 3-1 victory for the Stars. "It was very flattering to them. We were all over them. It could easily have been 6-1," Voihanski said.

The final game of the preliminary round saw them tangle with the Korean Tigers, a new entry who appeared to be overmatched. The Israelis cruised to a 7-1 second period lead. The game ended 7-1.

Seeded second behind the 4-0 Italian Gladiators, the Stars faced off against the Polish Hussars in the quarter-finals.

It was a blowout, 7-1 in the end.

"We had a great game. Aside from the Irish game, that was our most complete game," said Voihanski.

Israel faced the Macedonian Lions in the semis, and they proved to be a more difficult foe. "They played us tough. They trapped us and tried to slow down our free-flowing game," Voihanski said.

In response, the Stars continued to skate hard, dumped the puck deep into the Lions' zone, cycled it and managed to put eight shots past the Lions' stopper. Final score: 8-4.

The championship was the rematch against the Shamrocks. "They play together year round," said Voihanski. "They're an older group, old school, they make no mistakes, are positionally sound, so you have to work hard for points."

Jordan Weinberg scored the opening goal in the first, Brendan Schwartz, Jesse' brother, scored the second in the second, and Jordan Weinberg got the third in the third.

That, of course, signalled the reincarnation of the Flyers' shtick.

"Once it became 3-0, it became a little bit of a gong show," Voihanski said.

Undefeated in the tournament, the Israeli Stars were deserving winners, Voihanski said. "We had a lot of talent, a lot of speed, we played smart, worked hard, kept the puck in deep and made few mistakes."

About half the guys were holdovers from the team that won two years ago, he added. "There's definitely a lot of talent out there. People need to know there's a lot of Jewish talent out there, playing at a high level, and committed."

Two years ago, with the war in Gaza going on, the Stars had an incentive to come together and show well. This year's edition was likewise "a tight knit group of players... who feel passion to put on the jersey with the Star of David," he said.

Voihanski expects that with a core of young players, the team will be competitive for years to come. He hopes more and more people come out to watch them play. "It's a really good brand of hockey," he said. "We put the pedal to the medal and go forward, forward, forward."

The Stars of David celebrate their victory.

The Canadian Multicultural Hockey League championships have been played on the same days since the first tournament in December 2005. Founded to promote hockey in traditionally non-hockey playing communities, more than 20 teams took part in 2010, representing over a dozen ethnicities. They played in three divisions. The Israeli Stars won the Canadian Cup in the men's Premier Division.

Save a Child's Heart volunteer is amazed by miracles of surgery

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

When Kim Edwards is asked about Save a Child's Heart (SACH), she finds it hard to stop talking.

For the past six years, the 25-year-old has spent part of her summers volunteering with the Israeli organization, living in the SACH house and helping look after the children. Since 1995, SACH doctors have performed heart surgery on more than 2,400 children all over the world.

Edwards found out about SACH while attending Queen's University for her undergraduate degree. She was involved in the Hillel chapter there, and one of their fundraisers was for the organization.

Going to Israel and volunteering with SACH for the first time was an amazing experience, she said.

"I fell in love with the charity and the people who work there and the children who come."

Edwards, who is currently studying to get her PhD in clinical psychology, is very passionate about helping children, evidenced by the way she talks about the ones she's met through SACH, including Salama, who was three years old when she came to Israel from Zanzibar.

"Salama had come over without her parents... she was really ill so she was taken to the hospital right away. I met her just after her surgery," Edwards said.

"I really developed a motherly instinct that summer, because when I left I felt like I was leaving a child of mine behind. The bond that we had was so amazing. When she cried at the hospital and I was at the house, the nurses would call and ask me to speak to her."

Another child, a one-year-old boy, came from Romania with his 17-year-old mother. Before his heart surgery, he had spent his entire life in a hospital in Romania because he was so sick.

"The mother's from such a poor town – there was no running water, no nothing, and [he] would have died if he stayed in that town," Edwards said. "There were some volunteers in the hospital who had seen a bunch of other children die from heart-related complications, and they decided they didn't want the same thing to happen to this little boy. So they got on the Internet to search for options, and they found Save a Child's Heart.

"He took his first step in Israel," she added. "Before he'd been crawling around, and after his surgery, his little body was able to support his weight."

Then there was Happiness, who was three years old when she came from Tanzania.

"She's just so cute," Edwards said of Happiness. "We used to sing 'if you're happy and you know it, clap your hands' when she was being fussy. She just loved it and she would start clapping her hands."

Edwards formed close bonds with many of the parents who came with their children to Israel, including one mother from Ghana.

"I came back to [the University of] Western [Ontario this past] September, and one afternoon I was really stressed out and working on a big paper. Then I got a phone call... and it was this mother from Ghana," Edwards said.

"She had walked to another village and bought a phone card, and called me just to tell me that her baby was doing well and how much she missed me. It was so amazing to get that kind of call because it puts life in perspective."

Seeing how surgery has saved so many young lives puts the availability of first-class medical care in Canada into perspective for Edwards.

Salama, with Edwards, was three years old when she came from Zanzibar to Israel for heart surgery.

"After the surgery, they're like a whole different child and the future is so bright for them. To know that a six- or eight-hour surgery can add 40 or 50 years onto someone's life is really amazing."

Edwards remembers watching a Palestinian child undergoing heart surgery.

"It was amazing to see this child's heartbeat on a monitor beforehand and have the doctors explain to me how the blood flow looked different after. This operation completely changed this child's heart," she said.

"[Afterward] the boy's father came over to me and said 'thank you' in broken English, I thought he had mistaken me for a doctor... and tried to explain that I'm not the person he should be thanking. Eventually I realized how much it meant to him when he saw me [in the operating room] and recognized me from playing with his child.

"Going to Save a Child's Heart for me is like a break from reality. You enter a different world where it doesn't matter what you look like or what you're wearing – it just matters that you are able to use hand gestures and smile and give a hug and be silly," Edwards continued.

"Someone once told me if the world was more like the SACH house, then the world would be a better place, and I think it's true."

In addition to performing heart surgeries, SACH also trains doctors from other countries.

"At SACH this summer, I learned that Israel has around a population of seven million and there are 65 pediatric cardiologists for Israel," Edwards said. "Ethiopia has around a population of 70 million and they have three pediatric cardiologists.

"Everyone deserves a chance," she added. "I was chatting with [a woman from Gaza] a few years ago, and her daughter was extremely sick. She took her daughter to a hospital in Gaza, and they basically told her to let her daughter die and have another child.

"She refused to give up. She found her way to... Israel, and the doctors agreed to operate."

"כדאי לך להטוב על דברים שקורים בהחלה." מסכים מאיר, בעיד אמני מחשלים בבחיכה כבדיוק' מרמה ("אדסנא מיזמן, בבקשה").

"אבל אני לא אמצוב דברים טכנים. אנשים מתים על הזמנה שלי. היזאה אך הגלן לי סם המדיר מאבלית?" אני מתיעצת. מאיר מהנהן, סקפטי כרגיל.

"אנשים אוהבים אוכל!"

"בסדר, אמדיר, אוהבים. הביהבי לכסל על ההצגה שלך. זה גם יעזור לך ליהנות את עצמך, וגם חומר אוקטאלי ומעניין". מאיר מסכם את השיחה ליבי את המהנן.

"סוב, אז תכשיב." ואני מקלידה בחשיבות רבה על הלפטופ. למרך המרגה שלי: "אם מהחשק לכם לראות אותי למעגם של הטבעת לשימור הזהות הישראלית בפדיה. ואני חשבה לעצמה. הי, אני תמיד יוצאת את הבית המלוכה, אם כבר מדברים על ספת'ונז), חקרה בעניינות בסניות- מי תידעם לי את ההצגה האבולית.

"מה זיעומית?" חייכתי בפה מלא (תפאת). "כתבתי את ההצגה אאלית, בפיטה!"

Urban Writer

By Avrum Rosensweig

I am sitting in a Holiday Inn in Peterborough, Ont. I'm overlooking the Trent-Severn Waterway, a small body of water framed by railway tracks to the north and cottages to the south.

Since I began painting in 1995, I have heard that much of nature is grey, a colour expressed through the trunks of trees and the well-walked earth.

Today, however, I am overwhelmed by what seems to be the complete greyishness of the day and the utter beauty of this colour that's often thought of as bland. The solid ice, a winter shoreline, is greenish-grey. The naked branches of the pine and spruce trees are brownish-grey, and the distant skyline is bluish-grey.

Interestingly, when my friend Burt looks out the window, he sees a bland, nasty day. He describes the greyish scenario as "sombre." Through his sight, the greys of the Peterborough winter are dull, somewhat like the skies and moods of a Russian film.

This colour that thrills me places a damper on his day. In it, within the grey, he senses a season hibernating, a time perhaps closer to death than life – "something that will be," a "sleepy hollow."

I see a palette. I detect something very much awake and raring to go! Because of these greys I am compelled to sketch and paint. They encourage me to remember the Impressionists who looked out over the darkening fields and nearly unlit villages of Europe. How exciting.

The real consideration, however, is that two sets of eyes see so differently. While Burt's grey is one thing, mine is another. While his represents a very particular world, mine presents something else. Amazingly, both are valid.

So how are we to deal with this reality? How do we accept that that which we focus on appears differently to me than it does to you?

For the Jewish people, 2011 will be a year when this question will be asked over and over. Whose grey is truer? The Israeli government is negotiating with Palestinian leadership, and there are those who will see this situation as putting the Jewish state in peril. Others will look at it and be convinced that they are seeing a colourful grey, an environment in which peace will be possible. Two sets of eyes; two different conclusions. Which grey is truer?

This year will be a most interesting year because the schism between denominations is growing bigger. Orthodox Judaism is moving more to the right, and while Conservative and Reform Judaism have taken the same turn, the differences between the two – particularly having to do with conversion – are enormous. Here the greys have become muted. How are we to see them?

I have studied art over the years, looking closely at Vincent van Gogh. He never bores me, and I want to learn more about his life, brushstrokes, choice of colours, especially the tans, ochres, reds, oranges and greys. I will stare at The Potato Eaters for hours on end. But not everybody will. I know there are those who dislike van Gogh. Is he a good artist or otherwise? Whose grey shall we rely upon? Whose vision shall we trust?

Peterborough and its greyish winter made me reflect on this question, on this human condition. What are we seeing, when we see it? How does it look to us, and how does it look to them? What is reality in all of this? It will be a most interesting year. Look closely.

Vandals strike five Montreal institutions

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – in the wake of sporadic but regular vandalism, the Jewish community reached a "tipping point" this past weekend after five institutions were hit on one night, said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, chair of Federation CJA's security co-ordinating committee.

Four Montreal synagogues and one school were hit by vandals in the early hours of Jan. 16. The synagogues – Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem (TBDJ), Beth Rambam, Beth Zion and Dorshei Emet – all had single rocks thrown through their front windows. The same thing happened at Yavne Academy.

All but one are in Cote St. Luc. Dorshei Emet is in Hampstead.

B'nai Brith Quebec deplored the attacks and called on police to review past attacks, "which may have been dismissed as isolated examples of vandalism." The federation was also expected to issue a statement on Monday.

Rabbi Poupko said it's believed that all the incidents took place between 2 and 3 a.m. on Sunday. A janitor who left Beth Rambam at around 2 a.m. returned an hour later and discovered the broken window.

A video camera at one of the institutions – not all have cameras or well-located ones, Rabbi Poupko said – showed two men emerging from a car, throwing the rock and then leaving.

The incident was the most serious to hit the Jewish community since September 2009, when three Cote St. Luc synagogues had their windows shattered by rocks, apparently also by two men in a car.

Moshe Ben-Shach, director of operations at Federation CJA, who oversees security at community institutions, said that the incidents are being viewed with concern, and police are investigating it seriously.

He said such incidents have been "sporadic" and that the priority is for the community to act "cohesively and in strength."

Rabbi Poupko said, however, that such incidents have been occurring on a more regular basis, perhaps once a month, but they have gone unreported for fear of triggering "copycats" or creating, "an unreasonable degree of fear."

CANADA

Sentence Praised

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress praised the six-month jail sentence given Jan. 10 to a Nova Scotia man who burned a cross on the front lawn of a mixed-race couple last year. "We commend the Nova Scotia courts for sending a strong message that reflects Canadian society's revulsion against hate-motivated crimes. This has been a precedent-setting case, the first time in Canada that cross burning has been recognized for what it is – a hate crime," Congress CEO Bernie Farber said. Nathan Rehberg, 21, was convicted along with his brother, Justin, 20, of burning a two-metre-high cross on the Poplar Grove, N.S., lawn of Shayne Howe, who is black, and Michelle Lyon, who is white. It's believed to be the first cross-burning case in Canada. Justin Rehberg, who reportedly admitted his guilt almost immediately, received two months in jail.

WORLD

Visitor Record

WARSAW — The Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp attracted a record number of visitors in 2010. Some 1.38 million people toured the site in southern Poland, up from 1.3 million in 2009, the Auschwitz memorial museum said Jan. 12. More than a half-million Poles visited the site, as well as 84,000 Britons, 74,000 Italians, 68,000 Germans and 63,000 French nationals. About 59,000 Israelis toured the site, and 850,000 of the visitors ranged from schoolage to university students.

Bardot Leads Drive

PARIS — Former French actress and sex symbol Brigitte Bardot is leading an animal rights campaign against kosher and halal methods of slaughtering animals. Some 2,000 posters have been plastered throughout France this month to "inform" people of the "Middle Age" methods used to "slit the throats of animals without anesthesia in order to please God." Bardot, 77, said that her Brigitte Bardot Foundation and other animal rights groups battled authorities for the right to criticize the practices with the posters.

Palin Criticized For 'Blood Libel' Claim

NEW YORK — Sarah Palin's use of the term "blood libel" to decry blaming conservatives for the Arizona shooting has raised the ire of some in the Jewish community.

Sarah Palin

In a Jan. 12 video statement, the former U.S. vice-presidential candidate said: "Acts of monstrous criminality stand on their own. They begin and end with the criminals who commit them. Especially within hours of a tragedy unfolding, journalists and pundits should not manufacture a blood libel that serves only to incite the very hatred and violence they purport to condemn. That is reprehensible."

The blood libel refers to accusations that began in the Middle Ages that Jews used the blood of murdered Christian children to make matzah for Passover.

Palin has been criticized since the Jan. 8 shooting for using images of a gun crosshair to identify vulnerable districts in the November elections, including that of U.S. Rep. Gabrielle Giffords (D-Ariz.), who was shot in the head and seriously injured in the attack at a Tucson shopping mall that left six dead and a dozen injured.

Jewish Funds for Justice president Simon Greer noted in a statement that "blood libel" isn't a synonym for false accusation, but rather refers to a specific false charge. He said Palin's usage is "totally out of line."

Jewish Americans for Sarah Palin, however, defended the politician. "Falsely accusing someone of shedding blood is a blood libel, whether it's medieval Christians accusing Jews of baking blood in Passover matzahs or... political partisans blaming conservative political figures and talk-show hosts for the Tucson massacre," said director Benyamin Korn.

Teacher Reinstated

PARIS — A Jewish high school history teacher in France who was suspended four months for spending too much class time on the Holocaust and organizing school trips to concentration camps was reinstated. Catherine Pederzoli, 58, who teaches in Nancy, near the German border, was also criticized for using the term Shoah instead of genocide. She was assigned to another school in Nancy.

HBC stand firm against Israeli boycott calls

Pro-Palestinian group urges retail giant to stop carrying Ahava products

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Hudson's Bay Company (HBC) says it will never capitulate to calls to boycott Israeli products.

That's the message the Canadian retail giant delivered to the Jewish community late last week in the wake of persistent rumours that it had acceded to the demands of a pro-Palestinian group that urged it to stop carrying Israeli-made Ahava cosmetics.

Those rumours were further fuelled by a mishandled public relations response that had senior HBC management scrambling to deny that the iconic Canadian retailer had succumbed to calls for it to boycott Ahava products after the company quietly pulled the Israeli-made beauty line from its shelves nationwide early last week.

When Canadian Ahava consumers noticed that the line was missing from HBC's stock last week, they began questioning the retailer about why, but they got little response from the company.

The real scapegoat

It cannot be a restful watch these days for the leaders, strongmen, monarchs, despots, autocrats, tyrants and other anti-democrats who rule the Arab world. The latest developments in Tunisia must make them feel somewhat uneasy.

Panic-stricken and fearing for his life and the lives of his family, President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali stealthily fled his country in the dark of last Friday night. He had ruled Tunisia for 23 years in a manner that most observers described as "iron-fisted."

The end came for Ben Ali quite suddenly. Like a match thrown on dry tinder, the street rioting grew fiercer, uglier, more brutal, deadlier and more widespread. Sparked by the self-immolatory suicide of a despairing student a week earlier, Tunisians gave vent and continue to give vent to their despair and their rage at the utter dishonesty, indifference and corruption of their government. Even the usually astute diplomatic corps and media were taken by surprise at the extent and the ferocity of the civil unrest.

From the editor's desk...

As these words are being written, Tunisia is in chaos. Dozens have been murdered. Shooting can be heard in various locations around the country.

Fouad Mebazaa, the former parliament speaker, was sworn in as interim president. He has asked Prime Minister Mohamed Ghannouchi to form a government of national unity. Presidential elections, he said, should be held within 60 days. Whether this will happen is anyone's guess.

In an irony too rich with the sharp, instructive pain of poignant timing, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton upbraided the leaders of the Arab world even as the rioters had taken to the streets in Tunisia. According to the New York Times, speaking at a conference last Thursday in Doha, Qatar, Clinton warned the leaders of the Arab world that their countries could "sink into the sand of unrest and extremism unless they liberalized their political systems and cleaned up their economies."

The secretary of state used the occasion to ring the alarm of warning very loudly. "Those who cling to the status quo may be able to hold back the full impact of their countries' problems for a little while, but not forever. If leaders don't offer a positive vision and give young people meaningful ways to contribute, others will fill the vacuum." She then identified the "others."

"Extremist elements, terrorist groups... who would prey on desperation and poverty are already out there, appealing for allegiance and competing for influence."

The Times report described the secretary's remarks as "striking for their vehemence... Mrs. Clinton saved her most scathing remarks for corruption, which she said was corroding Arab economies and making life impossible for foreigners who ran businesses in Arab countries."

The question, of course, was whether her audience was taking any of her message to heart. After all, the substance of the message was not new. Only its fervency was. Arab world rulers have long pointed to a scapegoat to distract their respective people away from a true accounting of their society's ills. Most often, of course, that scapegoat has been Israel and the unresolved conflict with the Palestinians. They tried the same tactic with the secretary of state. But she deftly turned it aside. The Times reporter wrote that "Clinton noted that the U.S. was the top financial donor to the Palestinian Authority, an implicit rebuke of Arab states which champion the Palestinian cause... but do too little to support its efforts to build institutions in the West Bank."

The leaders sitting silently in their chairs in Doha undoubtedly resented the secretary's bold talk. But if they were not listening to her, perhaps they were listening to the shooting and the shattering of glass in Tunisia?

The most recent United Nations Development Programme report covering the Arab world was written in 2009 (Arab Human Development Report). It is the fifth such report.

The publisher of the document (the United Nations) describes it as "an independent publication that gives a voice to a representative group of Arab intellectuals whose sober and self-critical appraisals might not otherwise be heard in the particular circumstances of the region."

In other words, it is impossible to conceive of the governments in the Arab world allowing such a report to be written. And for good reason: it is an unwithering condemnation of the governance of the peoples in the Arab world.

At every level and in every category of the human condition, the report describes the pitiful lack of advance throughout the Arab world. For example, it is hard to believe, but according to the report, "the Arab countries were less industrialized in 2007 than in 1970, almost four decades previously."

Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali no longer has a scapegoat. And he no longer has a country.

The Arab Human Development Report can be found on line at the website for the UN Development Programme.

Attacks now under investigation

"Police need to dedicate more resources to the investigation," he said.

One source told The CJN that about two weeks ago, "a major community institution" was hit by vandals, but the incident went unreported.

Rabbi Poupko also said he has heard concerns that groups who have been calling for local boycotts of Israeli-made goods might be "riling up extremists" to the point of committing such acts.

"It is reasonable to ask the question," Rabbi Poupko said. "Those are the questions I'm hearing from people."

Quebec Jewish Congress, in a statement on Monday morning, also strongly denounced the vandalism. Such acts threaten our society's values of liberty and tolerance, QJC president Adam Atlas said.

TBDJ's Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz wrote in his blog that while the attack was "not the end of the world... a few hundred dollars damage... a broken window sends shock waves.

"The perpetrators broke this window because they hate Jews," he wrote. "They hate me, my wife and my children, and they hate my community."

Added Rabbi Poupko: "There's a point where enough is enough. These are cowards who throw rocks through windows under the cover of darkness... but [they] will not determine how the community organizes itself or uses its institutions."

Rally for anti-Islamist group draws protesters

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Outside in the chill, police held back noisy protesters, at least four of whom were arrested. One police officer suffered a broken rib. Inside, common cause was forged between two controversial groups.

Roughly 50 protesters representing various anti-racist and social action groups, many with their faces obscured by scarves and balaclavas, gathered at the Toronto Zionist Centre on Marlee Avenue Jan. 11 to oppose a handshake and newly minted relations between the Jewish Defence League (JDL) and the U.K.-based English Defence League (EDL).

Protesters shouted slogans and taunts at members of the JDL. Police horseback units were brought in to contain the unruly demonstration.

Indoors, Meir Weinstein, head of the JDL in Canada, explained to about an equal number of attendees why his organization has reached out to the EDL, an anti-Islamist group that has been denounced as extremist.

Weinstein's promised online chat with EDL founder Stephen Lennon, who goes by the name Tommy Robinson, was marred only by a poor Skype connection, but the Briton's message was clear: Canadians "need to wake up. The Islamicization of your country is on its way."

The highly publicized JDL rally in support of the EDL was opposed by Canadian Jewish Congress, which said last week that while it feels Islamic fundamentalism is "a real threat," fighting it with "generalized hatred against Muslims, as does the EDL, is only a recipe for fuelling more conflict.

"When extremists come together we all too often get a combustible reaction," stated CJC CEO Bernie Farber. "Violence, no matter who the perpetrator must be condemned. Using the tactics of hooligans whether from the right or the left is appalling."

Critics have charged the EDL with being racist, fascist and Islamophobic, and that its rallies often turn violent. The group was formed last year and is resolutely working class in its outlook and philosophy.

The EDL is "a far-right extremist organization" that has organized "violent street marches that target Arab and Muslim people," reads an open letter signed by two dozen activist groups, among them Ontario Coalition Against Poverty, Queers Against Israeli Apartheid and the Canadian Arab Federation.

To enthusiastic applause, Weinstein noted that charges against Robinson of assaulting a police officer stemming from a confrontation with Muslims last Remembrance Day in London were dropped that very day, Jan. 11.

The JDL is forging relations with the EDL in order to "take a stand against the forces of political Islam," according to the JDL's website.

In his remarks, Weinstein said "a bond must be established with those groups that we believe to be on the same page and fighting the same tyranny."

The threat of militant Islamism "is much more serious than any threat we face. We are obligated to take a stand," Weinstein said.

Robinson, 27, said that since the incident last Remembrance Day, in which a group of militant Muslims burned poppies and said British soldiers should "burn in hell," the EDL has gained 18,000 members.

British police "are petrified of Islam," he said in his 15-minute talk.

Ultimately, Robinson said, Islam and western democracy "are incompatible, like oil and water."

Morally vacuous, intellectually dishonest

It is a misnomer of severely grandiose proportions that the local group leading the charge for boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) against Israel is called Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East, for their vision of justice is founded upon the dissolution of the only sovereign Jewish state on earth. And the peace that would result in their model Middle East is the eerie, haunting silence that descends upon a charred landscape after its destruction.

Last week, they urged their followers in Toronto to boycott the Bay for selling the Ahava line of Dead Sea beauty products. They were undoubtedly inspired to do so by the surrender of the British retailer John Lewis in announcing it would no longer sell Ahava products. Their call for boycott, however, fell upon deaf ears. The Bay issued a statement that succinctly stated it "neither subscribes to nor endorses politically motivated boycotts of merchandise from countries with which Canada has open and established trading relationships, including Israel."

In Montreal, the boycott advocates have also been turned aside. As reported in The CJN, Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) began Saturday afternoon demonstrations Oct. 2 outside the small, family-run, Boutique Le Marcheur on St. Denis Street, which has been in existence for more than 30 years, urging buyers to avoid the store because it carries a line of shoes made in Israel.

David Ouellette, research and communications director of the Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) told The CJN that "the media coverage [of the boycott of Le Marcheur] aroused a wave of moral indignation." Although unions and other organizations such as the Federation des femmes du Québec officially endorse the boycott of Israel, Ouellette says "there is no public support for BDS in Quebec. Quebecers don't buy the apartheid label."

The boycott-divestment-sanctions edifice rests upon a phony, false, fake foundation: the calumny that Israel is an apartheid state. The accusation is not only intellectually dishonest, it is also morally vacuous, especially in light of the determined yet transparent campaign by Palestinian Authority leaders to resist peace treaty negotiations with Israel.

And yet, even though false, alas, the epithet has significant purchase among the misinformed and the malevolent.

PAJU said its aim was to make St. Denis Street an "Israeli apartheid free zone." But the people who shout "apartheid" at Israel are really shouting "Israel must cease to exist."

We must not be fooled into thinking their purpose is anything less. That is why ever and always we must always "shout" back: "Your words are false. We will not surrender to your lies."

Israel shall not die, but live.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel and Spain established diplomatic ties, ending nearly 40 years of chilled relations. Fearing a retaliatory terror strike, Spain increased security at airports and embassies. Israel declined ties in 1948 because of Spain's close relations with Nazi Germany, but ties thawed after right-wing dictator Gen. Francisco Franco died in 1975.

The Peto thesis

Regarding Prof. Anna Shternshis' opinion that it would have been best to disregard the Peto thesis, I feel that she has made an error in judgment ("It's no longer just about the master's thesis," Jan. 13). When something like Peto's thesis, The Victimhood of the Powerful: White Jews, Zionism and the Racism of Hegemonic Holocaust Education, is given the imprimatur of a major university rather than ignoring it and hoping that it isn't noticed, I believe it's best to expose, critique and ridicule the hatred, ignorance and thoughtless bias such work represents and that of a program that would foster bigotry. The issue extends far beyond that of a substandard paper being accepted as the basis of a master's degree. It reveals the bias and politicization of an entire program at the University of Toronto. Matters like this can only be addressed if they are exposed so that the public can be aware of them. In my opinion, the results have been positive and bear out that approach.

If the Quebec government plans to forbid religious instruction in subsidized daycares because of the new overriding principle of secularism ("Que. daycare religion ban upsets community," Jan. 6), why does it adamantly refuse to remove the crucifix, a clearly religious symbol, from the Assemblée Nationale, Quebec's parliament? Quebec's own Bouchard-Taylor Commission, set up to look at the issue of "reasonable accommodation," recommended that it be taken down!

Quebec's Charte des droits et libertés de la personne (Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms), adopted on June 27, 1974, says in Chapter IV, Article 41: "Parents or persons acting on their behalf have the right to ensure the religious and moral education of their children according to their beliefs, all the while respecting the rights and interests of their children." These new guidelines contradict this clause of the charter and appear to be unconstitutional. They also contradict Quebec's current policy on private elementary and high schools, which are allowed to teach religion as long as they follow the province's curriculum.

Chana Rosenberg, who works in one of the YM-YWHA's four CPEs (centres de la petite enfance), is quoted as saying that daycare centres "would have to significantly alter their activities, including, for example, abandoning weekly Shabbat observance." Has she forgotten that the Y itself has recently abandoned any and all observance of Shabbat? If we don't respect our own religion, how can we expect others to?

A step toward healing

As Jews who hope for peace, we urge the Israeli government to do what is right by acknowledging the tragic mistake that took the lives of Izzeldin Abuelaish's three daughters and his niece on Jan. 16, 2009 ("Palestinian doctor hopes 'wisdom will prevail,'" Jan. 13). Abuelaish, who has filed a lawsuit against Israel, is not seeking money for himself but rather wants a contribution to be made to a trust fund that he has dedicated to nurturing leadership among Middle Eastern women in the fields of education and health. He would also like to build a conference centre at the Tel Hashomer Hospital in Israel, where his daughter, Shada, was saved, to be named in the memory of those who have died.

Abuelaish is a role model for peace and reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians. His bestselling book, I Shall Not Hate, is inspirational. We call on the Israeli government to take responsibility, apologize and find a way to commemorate the memories of Bessan, Mayar, Aya and Nour. It will be a step toward healing for both Jews and Palestinians.

Meeting with Assad

I find the statement of Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-president of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations very surprising ("Assad Meeting," Jan. 13). He says that his trip to meet the Syrian president involved restoration of shuls. That is remarkable! There are only about 26 elderly Jews left in the whole country. It would be better had he asked for restitution for all the community buildings, private homes and businesses obliged to be left behind by a once-thriving Jewish community that has escaped to freedom.

Rabbi recalls marching with King in 1961

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

Rabbi Israel Dresner, 81, says he's the most arrested rabbi in America.

At least that was the case in the 1960s, he says, when he was one of dozens of rabbis who answered the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s call for clergy from the North to join the civil rights movement in the Jim Crow South.

From the Freedom Rides of 1961 to the famous march in Alabama from Selma to Montgomery in March 1965, when Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel walked in the front row with Rev. King, Jews were prominent participants in the battle for civil rights that dominated the first half of the '60s.

Of the thousands of white activists who headed South, nearly half were Jewish, according to Jewish Dimensions of Social Justice, a 1998 publication of the Reform movement.

"This was living out what Judaism itself has been teaching all along, that you have to help the oppressed, the underprivileged, not stand idly by the blood of your neighbour," said Rabbi David Teitelbaum, 84, of Redwood City, Calif.

As the United States prepared to mark Martin Luther King Day on Jan. 17, some rabbis who travelled South to join the man who would go on to win a Nobel Peace Prize talked to JTA about the civil rights struggle.

Rabbi Teitelbaum went to Alabama with four other rabbis from northern California in March 1965 for the voter registration drive of African Americans and the Selma march.

The rabbis who joined these efforts were arrested, jailed and sometimes beaten, protected by the colour of their skin from the worst physical dangers, but nonetheless threatened on a daily basis.

Rabbi Dresner's first arrest was in June 1961, when he and the late Rabbi Martin Freedman of Paterson, N.J., along with eight Protestant ministers, formed the first interfaith clergy Freedom Ride. Their bus was part of a summer-long campaign of white and black activists, many of them clergy, who travelled together throughout the South to draw attention to the evils of segregation.

The young Rabbi Dresner went to jail each summer for the next three years as he brought ever larger groups of rabbis and ministers to join the struggle in the South.

"I was a Reform rabbi, but I always wore a yarmulke," said Rabbi Dresner, now rabbi emeritus of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Wayne, N.J. "I wanted people to know I was Jewish."

The president of the NAACP at the time was Kivie Kaplan, a prominent member of the Reform movement's social action commission. Kaplan bought the Washington building that became the headquarters for the movement's new Religious Action Center and also housed the fledgling Leadership Council on Civil Rights.

Black and Jewish lawyers, on a table in that office, drafted what became the major civil rights laws of the mid-'60s, recounted Al Vorspan, who directed the Reform commission for 50 years.

It was a time when Jews and blacks often found common cause in the struggle for justice in a country where both had been oppressed.

Rabbi Matthew Simon, 79, now the emeritus rabbi of B'nai Israel in Rockville, Md., was working at a Conservative congregation in Los Angeles when he joined the 1965 Selma march.

"I had very good relationships with the black clergy in the San Fernando Valley," he recalled. "We worked together on social action issues, on voting rights and housing rights, not just in Los Angeles but all over the country."

> 'This was living out what Judaism itself has been teaching all along, that you have to help the oppressed'

Jews who took part in these efforts took considerable push-back from fellow Jews who felt that Jewish activism was better directed at issues of Jewish, not general, concern.

Most of the rabbis who marched with Rev. King, or joined the Freedom Riders, were Reform, said Vorspan, now senior vice-president emeritus of the Union for Reform Judaism, formerly known as the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

UAHC came out "strongly and unequivocally" in favour of civil rights activism, he said, but the rabbis who went South risked more than physical danger.

"Many of their congregations were on the verge of firing them for it," Vorspan said. "I personally went to several congregations threatening to fire their rabbis and told them it would be a 'chillul HaShem,' " a desecration of God's name.

Three of the largest Reform temples in the country, including Temple Emanuel in New York, temporarily withdrew from the Reform movement, he recalled, because of the movement's support for the civil rights struggle and later opposition to the war in Vietnam.

Meanwhile, leading black activists were borrowing heavily from Jewish sources, particularly the Bible, in their sermons and speeches. Rev. King himself often used biblical motifs, especially the Exodus, to dramatize the African-American journey from slavery to freedom.

One night in Georgia in the summer of 1962, Rabbi Dresner and Rev. King were trapped with other activists in a house surrounded by hundreds of members of the local White Citizens Council.

While they were waiting for help, Rev. King told the rabbi about the Passover seder he'd attended that spring at a Reform synagogue in Atlanta. He particularly recalled reading the Haggadah and hearing the phrase, "We were slaves in Egypt."

"Dr. King said to me, 'I was enormously impressed that 3,000 years later, these people remember their ancestors were slaves, and they're not ashamed," Rabbi Dresner said. "He told me, 'We Negroes have to learn that – not to be ashamed of our slave heritage.'"

Negro was the accepted term for African American in the 1960s, Rabbi Dresner noted.

In March 1965, Rabbi Saul Berman, then the spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Israel in Berkeley, Calif., travelled to Alabama with the rabbinic delegation from northern California.

Black leaders in Selma called, asking the rabbis to bring a box of kippot, or yarmulkes, with them.

"At that time, black people in the South were wearing kippot as a freedom cap," explained Rabbi Berman, now a prominent Orthodox scholar who teaches at Stern College and Columbia University school of law in New York. "It was an extraordinary indication of the extreme penetration of the Jewish community."

At the same time, Rabbi Berman said, a "disturbing undercurrent" began to surface in the movement. As his group of 150 activists was arrested for the second time on their way to Selma, debate broke out as to whether they should disband, with a promise not to return, as local police were urging.

"They didn't want to book us – half the group was clergy," he said.

As the white ministers pondered the best move, the black participants became angry.

"The question arose – whose movement is this?" Rabbi Berman said. "It was a precursor of much more intense feelings of that sort that emerged in the late '60s as black leaders began to resent white leaders who felt the civil rights movement was 'theirs.' I didn't recognize the significance of that scene until much later."

Many of the rabbis who were active in the civil rights struggle went on to support freedom for Soviet Jewry, motivated by the same sense of prophetic justice that drew them to the South, and by the desire to protect their fellow Jews in trouble, a more particularist concern that grew as the decades passed.

Today, relations between the black and Jewish communities are rarely as strong as they were in the heyday of the civil rights struggle.

"The issues of concern today are those of American society as a whole, not of blacks being able to enter American society," said Rabbi Simon, who notes that even after 30 years in suburban Washington, he still does not know his local black clergy. "I interact with them from time to time, but they've never come to us for a common action."

Still, vestiges of commonality remain.

Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Religious Action Center, is the only non-African American on the board of the NAACP. Many synagogues and Jewish community centres run freedom seders at Passover with local African-American and Latino leaders, or interfaith Shabbat services to honour Martin Luther King Day.

And rabbis who marched with Rev. King say they'd do it again.

"Because I'm Jewish," Rabbi Dresner said. "I didn't see any alternative."

Finding the balance in academic freedom

Not infrequently, people tell me they've read my column in The CJN. Most often, they say this with a smile, suggesting that – even when they disagree – they enjoy my take on an issue. Every so often, however, my readers aren't smiling. Every so often, they accost me or write to me to take issue in strong terms with what I've written. Sometimes I anticipate drawing a strong response. For example, when I write about Jewish feminism, a contentious issue in the Canadian Jewish community, readers react strongly in sympathy or in disagreement.

But I didn't anticipate that this would be the case after last month's column about the crisis facing the humanities in North American and Israeli universities. I thought readers would share my concern about the "utilitarian" view of universities that concentrates funds in programs with direct vocational relevance and impoverishes language instruction, and humanities more broadly. I didn't think the worries I expressed – about the future of Hebrew and Yiddish language instruction, and literature, philosophy and history – were contentious.

But my column drew a range of strong responses – from people who agreed with my concerns and from others who were angered by them. The objections were two-fold. Some people felt a university education should be strictly utilitarian, that anything beyond vocational training is simply an obstacle to be overcome. Others, more pointedly, believed that the university system had destroyed itself by allowing itself to become, in essence, the incubator of radical ideologies. In this light, courses beyond pragmatic training programs were not merely beside the point, but dangerous.

I understand what prompts this view. People read accounts of extreme anti-Israel activities on campuses and about ideologically driven teaching and research. This creates an impression of universities as pitched battlefields or boot camps for political indoctrination.

Fortunately, they're more diverse than that. But business-as-usual education doesn't draw headlines or inspire passion. Perhaps it should, so that the general impression of what goes on in academia doesn't become skewed. Certainly, there is good news about the health of Jewish studies. I recently took part in the annual meeting of the Association of Jewish Studies, which featured roughly 1,000 professors and graduate students discussing their research and pedagogy.

Still, I hear concerns that, under the cover of academic freedom, universities have abandoned their mission and principles. Indeed, the idea of academic freedom sometimes seems precious to many people outside the university – precious not in the laudatory sense of valuable, but in the derogatory sense of overly affected, contrived. Especially in contexts such as Canada – and Israel – where higher education is supported by government funding, people ask why a country should pay people to oppose its very values, policies and ideological underpinnings.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

But the airing and debate of ideas is important to the health of a democracy. An attempt earlier this year to legislate the ideological positions of courses and professors at Israeli universities accomplished something many think of as impossible: it brought together academics of all political stripes.

The dean of a major Israeli university told me recently that she found herself in the position – along with administrators and faculty from universities across the country – of demonstrating in support of professors whose political views she deeply opposes. Why? Because history has shown that censorship and suppression of ideas backfires, while open and free debate allows cultures to develop and improve. Pushing us beyond our comfort zone, it challenges us to refine our own thinking. On my own campus, and internationally, for example, I have spoken out against the BDS movement, often to audiences unsympathetic to my stance.

Under discussion in Israel is the development of a code of ethics to govern teaching in universities. Education Minister Gideon Sa'ar has asked Israel's Council for Higher Education for broad-based guidelines for academic freedom that, among other things, will protect the rights of professors and students on the radical left and the extreme right to express their views freely and without repercussions, and the rights of all students to hear a range of ideological viewpoints.

Attaining the right balance among these freedoms isn't easy. Scholarly organizations in many countries develop and continually revisit guiding principles that respect pluralism, openness, fairness, and balance. The extreme margins garner headlines. But the work of the centre promotes vitality.

Peace, piece by piece

An arranged marriage is based on at least three assumptions: (1) love isn't a condition; (2) it serves the interests of both partners, and (3) neither has a better alternative. That's the view of Prof. Majid Al-Haj, vice-president and dean of research at the University of Haifa. His academic specialty is the sociology of marriage.

Last November, he spoke in Toronto when Bob Rae was given an honorary doctorate by the university. Applying his insights to Israeli-Palestinian relations, Al-Haj suggested that arranged marriages provide a helpful formula for a workable, if not idyllic, peace between Arabs and Jews.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

He believes it's futile to expect Palestinians and Israelis to love each other. We already know that though neither Egyptians nor Jordanians care much for Israelis, or vice versa, the treaties between Israel and the two Arab countries are holding because they're in the best interest of all sides, and because the alternatives would be much worse.

Similarly, the absence of love shouldn't prevent normal relations between Israel and a Palestinian state, however cold the peace may be. In the same way as once-warring Europeans learned to live with each other as good neighbours, so, too, in time can Arabs and Jews.

One reason why peace still seems far away is because of lingering delusions on both sides that the present state of tension serves their interests. Each may also be vainly looking for more acceptable alternatives. The sooner they realize that this is futile, the quicker they'll make peace.

But for this, a fourth factor is also needed: an active, imaginative and skilled match-making process. Hitherto the United States has had that task, but it's generally recognized that it hasn't been successful. Despite shuttle diplomacy and much handshaking for photographers, nothing substantial seems to have been achieved in recent years.

That's why, for example, Shlomo Avineri, a political science professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, wrote last month in Ha'aretz that "the United States must abandon its fruitless efforts to obtain a final agreement in favour of examining the option of interim agreements or partial, perhaps even unilateral, measures."

Along similar lines, Alon Ben-Meir, a professor of international relations at New York University, suggested in the same paper that the Obama administration "must now accept the deserved blame for failing to properly assess the political and physical realities on the ground." He, too, implied that peace is best achieved piece by piece. Only at a much later stage can the fragments be put together into a comprehensive agreement.

Contrary to bombastic declarations by both sides, thoughtful Israelis seem to agree. They sense that a different form of match-making is called for, this time conducted not by a superpower and its allies but by ordinary citizens across borders.

Israeli expertise in Internet communications may turn out to be of particular relevance. That's how I read Arianna Huffington's report in the Huffington Post about a conference she attended not long ago in Abu Dhabi. She was impressed by the immense advances in direct communication and social networking, and the effect this has already had, and is likely to have in the future, on the region's politics.

She believes that it's not what big powers and their bureaucrats conspire but what ordinary people do that will determine events from now on. Referring to the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, she quoted Kathleen Parker of the Washington Post that "the ancient rivalries and the heavy burdens of history are being lifted among a rising generation of world citizens." Instead of final status agreement between Palestinians and Israelis, we should expect small, mostly informal steps that incrementally will change the landscape and make peace inevitable.

Huffington writes: "No longer is our best hope for change in the region the far-too-often failed process of our [U.S.] government pressuring their governments. If fundamental change happens, it's going to come from the bottom up – with social media fueling the transformation."

In the same way as arranged marriages are increasingly being replaced by computer dating, so conventional diplomacy may have to yield to the efforts of ordinary folk in direct electronic communication with each other. They're likely to override previous expectations of comprehensive solutions and settle for peace made piece by piece.

This is probably the best Israelis and Palestinians can hope for.

Wartime Albania – a society at its best

Vera Held, a writer and public relations consultant in Toronto, heard an amazing story about human compassion eight years ago from a Canadian gym instructor of Albanian descent. Not a single Jewish person in Albania, occupied by Italy and Germany in World War II, was killed during the Holocaust, he told her. Being the first-born child of a Holocaust survivor from Hungary whose grandparents had been murdered in Auschwitz, she was astonished by this shining example of altruism.

Held's astonishment turned to surprise and admiration when she discovered that this predominantly Muslim state in the Balkans has the distinction of being the only country in wartime Europe whose Jewish population actually increased during the war.

Intrigued by this unique phenomenon, Held delved into the literature of Albania, a nation of 3.3 million whose hospitality toward strangers is deeply embedded in its culture and traditions.

Eager to learn more about this small nation, she travelled to Albania, which, for almost half a century until the fall of communism in the early 1990s, was Europe's hermit kingdom, the most reclusive and isolated country on the continent.

Saimir Lolja

Having visited Albania, Held took it upon herself to publicize its heroic and all too little known status as a haven for Jews during this darkest of periods. "I want to put Albania's role in the Holocaust on the map," she said, pointing out that 69 Albanians have been recognized as Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. (The flip side of the story is that ethnic Albanians from Kosovo joined a Nazi SS division.)

During Holocaust Education Week last November, Held organized a seminar on Albania, inviting several Albanian Canadians to share their knowledge.

One of the participants, Saimir Lolja, a chemical engineer who immigrated to Canada a decade ago, teaches at Ryerson University today. Lolja, 47, takes a special interest in Albania's Jewish history, even though so few Jews have lived there throughout the centuries. Jewish people have drifted in and out of Albania – a tolerant nation that attained its independence from the Ottoman Empire in 1912 – for about 1,000 years. On the eve of World War II, Albania was home to approximately 200 Jews.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Today, 150 Jews live in Albania.

Ever the historian, Lolja drew my attention to Herman Bernstein, the U.S. ambassador to Albania from 1930 to 1933, who wrote an article for the Jewish Daily Bulletin of New York in which he praised Albania's tradition of tolerance.

From 1933 until 1945, Lolja noted, 3,244 Jews from Yugoslavia, Greece, Austria, Germany, Bulgaria and Poland found sanctuary in Albania. "This number does not include [Jews] who entered Albania with either false passports or false names," he said.

Their position grew tenuous when Germany's ally, fascist Italy, invaded Albania several months before the outbreak of the war. With Nazi Germany's occupation of Albania in September 1943, the alarm bells sounded.

The Albanian government refused to hand over lists of Jews to German forces. But certain that Germany would treat them with the utmost severity, Jews asked Albanians for help.

Albanians who assisted Jews did so in accordance with an ancient code of conduct and personal behaviour, known respectively as kanun and besa.

"Kanun regulates all aspects of conduct within one's family, village and clan, with members of other clans and with complete strangers," explained Lolja. "Kanun has been the foundation of Albanian society over centuries."

Besa, on the other hand, enjoins an Albanian to protect a guest at all cost, Lolja said. "It is our golden rule of ethics. Treat others as you would like to be treated."

Kanun and besa also came into play, he observed, when Albanians extended their special brand of hospitality to Austro-Hungarian soldiers in World War I, Italian troops in World War II, Greeks escaping the Greek civil war in the late 1940s and ethnic Albanians fleeing Kosovo in 1999.

Thanks to kanun and besa, some 2,000 Jews, including Albanian Jews, were rescued from the jaws of death.

One of the rescuers was Mesut Salillari, a Muslim whose 45-year-old son, Admir, lives in Toronto today. Salillari, a worker in a first-class hotel in Tirana, Albania's capital city, helped the Hajons, a Jewish family who escaped from Belgrade, Yugoslavia, in the wake of Germany's invasion, said Admir, an employee on the support staff of the Toronto District School Board.

Salillari was introduced to the Hajons by a common friend. At first, Salillari lodged the Hajons – Shmuel, his wife, Dorica, and their three-old-daughter, Bina – in the hotel.

Later, he accommodated them in his own house, helped Shmuel find a job and arranged Albanian identity papers for all of them.

Admir Salillari

"All this had to be done in secrecy," said Admir. "Helping a Jew was a very risky business, a matter of life and death."

When Shmuel and Dorica were sent to a safe house, they left Bina behind in the care of Salillari's mother, who treated her like a daughter. "Bina spent the next three years with my grandmother," said Admir. "She learned to speak a perfect Albanian."

When Albania was liberated by the Allies on Nov. 29, 1944, the Hajons returned to Yugoslavia, keeping in touch with Salillari for the next few years. But when Enver Hoxha's Stalinist regime in Albania severed relations with Yugoslavia, their contacts ceased, not to be resumed again until 1993, when Salillari met the Hajons in a reunion in Israel.

In retrospect, Admir mused, his father put his life on the line to help the Hajons because he was true to Albania's code of honour.

"My father did what any self-respecting Albanian would do," said Admir. "He offered them besa."

Besa entered into the equation, too, when Viktor Batino's family was in danger.

In 1943, when Albania was occupied by Germany, Batino's grandfather, Haim, originally from the Greek city of Ioannina, was working as a merchant in the central Albanian town of Durres.

Much to his fortune, he made the acquaintance of Hasan Mesa, an Albanian Muslim from Kruje, a remote town in the mountains.

Mesa agreed to conceal Haim, his brothers, their wives and their children in his house. Batino's father, Moshe, Haim's son, was one of the hidden Jews. Mesa sheltered them for five months, from June to November 1944.

Mesa did not demand payment for his humanitarian services. "He did it for nothing, to help people," said Batino, who was born in Tirana in 1963 and is now a property manager in Toronto.

With the collapse of communism, Haim and his family, like most Jews in Albania, went to Israel. Life in Albania had become chaotic and uncertain under the fledgling democratic system.

The Batinos immigrated to Israel in 1991, living in Ashdod and Jaffa. Haim passed away in 1995, but before he died, he told Batino, his grandson, about the war years in Albania.

To Lolja, the rescue of Jews in Albania is a tale of goodness and generosity in the face of evil. Albanians, unlike many of their fellow Europeans, rose to the occasion during the Holocaust. As he said, "The Albanian example shows what society can be at its best."

New Or Hadash rabbi excited to serve community

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Or Hadash Synagogue's newly appointed spiritual leader, Rabbi Michal Shekel, is optimistic about building a relationship with her Newmarket congregants and serving their needs.

"These are congregants that form a strong community and people roll up their sleeves and do things," she said.

Rabbi Michal Shekel

"I'm very excited about working with this congregation. I think it's got tremendous potential, a lot of energy, a lot of good people."

Rabbi Shekel, 54, who was ordained by Hebrew Union College (HUC) in 1990 and serves as the Toronto Board of Rabbis' executive director – a position she'll continue to hold while also serving Or Hadash – said the Reform, egalitarian synagogue, which has about 50 member families, has committed lay leaders who are involved in all aspects of the congregation.

While she hopes her presence as the rabbi will bring more experience, expertise and new ideas into the mix, she stressed that she doesn't want members to mistake her for someone who wants to take over.

"It really isn't a matter of me telling them what we have to do. It's a matter of getting to know each other some more and seeing also what is important for them. It's a relationship," Rabbi Shekel said.

"Right now they need someone to come in, work with them and do some short-range and long-term planning that should help them expand the educational offerings, to help bring more to the services that they do."

Rabbi Shekel, a member of the first class of women accepted to the Conservative movement's flagship Jewish Theological Seminary of America (she later transferred to HUC), said that Jewish communities have become more accepting of female rabbis since she began her studies in 1984, and she feels her positive contributions to Jewish communities have more to with who she is a person rather than her gender.

"Men and women probably bring different things to the rabbinate based on gender, but certainly we all bring different things to the rabbinate based on personality and our own interests and strengths… The fact that you have both men and women participating now, I really think it strengthens Judaism and opens things up," she said.

"I think what I can bring to [Or Hadash] is my experience, knowledge, my passion for Judaism, and my love of learning. I love to teach, I love Torah and I love to help people grow in their Judaism in whatever way it is," said Rabbi Shekel, who also teaches adult classes on Jewish topics at Kolel – the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

"There is a lot that can be done in the community in terms of social action. I think outreach and creating interfaith ties – there is so much that can be done."

Or Hadash was founded in 1991 and officially joined the Union for Reform Judaism in 1993. In July, the congregation moved from its former Leslie Street location to downtown Newmarket on Botsford Street.

Rabbi Shekel, formerly an assistant rabbi at Toronto's Temple Har Zion who has also served shuls in London, Ont., Waterloo, Ont., Kingston, Ont., New York, New Jersey and Boston, said that while Newmarket's Jewish community is small compared to congregations in Toronto, Or Hadash plays a very important role in keeping its Jews connected.

She said congregations in smaller towns are more important than larger ones "because a place like Toronto is so Jewish. You've got Jewish stores, you've got kosher restaurants. It's kind of everywhere, whereas if you go out to a smaller community, you might have a child who is the only Jewish child in his or her class or grade level. So the congregation becomes much more important as a home."

Rabbi Shekel said that as a Jewish leader, she realizes that people relate to their Jewish roots in different ways, but she'd like more people to understand the benefits of being spiritually connected.

"You can go through life and be a good person and not be religious and not set foot in a synagogue, but there is an inexplicable richness that is brought to us [by observing Judaism], and it just opens up all sorts of avenues in terms of who you are, how you view the world and how you interact with others. It just takes things to another level that is really hard to put into words."

Rabbi Shekel said she is excited to build on her relationship with Or Hadash members.

"We have people there who are really eager to do things, eager to learn, eager to participate and eager to take part within the Jewish community and the greater community," she said.

"It's a very warm and welcoming environment and I hope that we continue to build up on all the marvellous qualities that it has already."

The Beach Hebrew Institute has been an active part of the local community for 90 years.

Beach shul celebrates 90th anniversary

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

After 90 years, Toronto's Beach Hebrew Institute is ready to celebrate.

"It feels splendid to be celebrating 90 years of a continuous Jewish presence in the Beach area," said Rosalee Monk, president of the shul. "The synagogue has become very much part of the community."

To mark the occasion, the shul, which counts 140 households as members, is hosting two free lectures that are open to the general public. A gala concert and dinner is also being planned for the summer.

On Jan. 23 at 3 p.m., Ellen Scheinberg, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, speaks on "The Toronto Jewish Community in 1920," highlighting the homes, synagogues, cemeteries, traditions and special events for some of the 30,000 Jewish people that were living in Toronto at the time.

On Feb. 20, also at 3 p.m., the shul will host Gene Domagala, a local historian, as he speaks about "The Jewish Presence in the Beach."

What has kept the shul going for so many years, Monk said, is the strong sense of community that exists between the members.

"There is a great sense of community within the synagogue. In fact, for many of us, we think of it as our second family and a place to share both triumphs and sorrows.

"For many years, the synagogue had no paid staff. Everything, including religious services, was led and accomplished by dedicated members of the congregation."

The values that the congregation holds, she continued, come from two men who were very involved in the shul over the years.

"The virtues of tolerance and inclusivity on which the membership prides itself are the legacy of two men: Arie Nerman, who was president for more than 30 years and is chairman of the 90th anniversary committee, and Sam Tanenbaum, who was ritual leader and spiritual guide of the congregation for over 40 years.

"Sam and his wife, Rivka, were Holocaust survivors from Slovakia and their influence still looms large in the sanctuary."

The shul is also very involved in Beach community life.

"We have been participating in the local drop-in lunch program since its inauguration," Monk said. "Our president emeritus represents the Jewish community on Memorial Day and other municipal holidays. Two of our members have been named Beach Citizen of the Year... We have been included in Doors Open Toronto more than once and we will be lending our premises to the Beach Business Improvement Association's Family Day activities next month."

Zareinu learnathon set for March

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Volunteers for Zareinu Educational Centre hope to raise $20,000 for the school at a Torah learnathon in early March.

"This is one organization that can't be let down," said Jason Lapidus, a Toronto investment adviser and First Zareinu Learnathon volunteer.

There is no alternative to it in Toronto's Jewish school system, he added.

Zareinu serves children with special needs including cerebral palsy, Down syndrome and autism spectrum disorder.

Annual tuition (if not subsidized) exceeds $45,000 per student and includes the cost of individualized therapy and special education. About 70 per cent of the school's annual $4-million budget is derived from fundraising, according to Zareinu's executive director, Randy Spiegel.

The learnathon is scheduled for Saturday, March 5, at 9 p.m. As of last Thursday, a dozen locations had been confirmed. At least one of them, however (Shaarei Tefillah Congregation), will hold the event the following morning.

Other locations include:

- Ahavas Yisrael Women's Groups (various locations)
- Ateres Mordechai, 230 Arnold Ave., Thornhill
- Chabad @ Flamingo
- Chabad Lubavitch of Markham
- Chabad Lubavitch of Toronto, 770 Chabad Gate, Thornhill
- Kollel Ohr Yosef, 613 Clark Ave. W., Thornhill
- Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation
- Thornhill Community Shul, 949 Clark Ave. W., Thornhill
- Thornhill Woods Shul
- The Village Shul
- Westmount Shul & Learning Centre, 10 Disera Drive, Suite 250, Thornhill

People who want to take part in the event are also invited to register their own locations, possibly in their homes.

All the money raised will go to Zareinu for operating expenses, Lapidus said. There is no overhead, he added.

The event is intended not only to raise money for the school, but also to promote Jewish unity, Lapidus said. All participants, regardless of Jewish cultural background or level of observance, will learn Torah. "Torah is Torah. That's what unites us."

Organizers hope the learnathon will become an annual event.

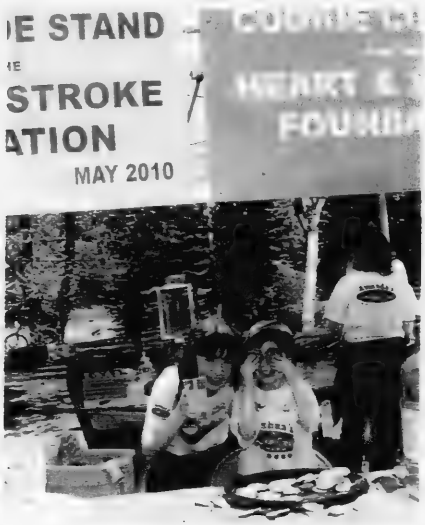
Kids conference focuses on entrepreneurial skills

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

After raising more than $151,000 for the Heart and Stroke Foundation in 12 years, 13-year-old Amanda Belzowski is hosting a conference to teach other kids about being an entrepreneur.



Amanda and Joshua Belzowski are seen at the 2010 Amanda's Lemonade Stand, which raises funds for the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

The Nothing's Impossible Young Entrepreneurs Conference is on Jan. 30 at the Lipa Green Centre. For kids aged 9 to 14, Amanda said, the conference will cover "my five areas of making a difference... through fun activities for each subject and games and some brainstorming sessions."

Since she was a baby – with the help of her family – Amanda has raised money for the Heart and Stroke Foundation through Amanda's Lemonade Stand, which she has run once a year. This year, her four-year-old brother, Joshua, is in charge of the event, something he is very excited about.

"I'm taking over the lemonade stand!" he cried when asked about his involvement.

It's because of this that Amanda is taking on new projects, including the conference and a concert, Lemonstock, that will take place this June.

"Over the years, people have come up to ask me how I started my lemonade stand, how can [they] do it too," she said, explaining the motivation behind the conference. "I created this course because every child has the ability to make a change in the world. This course will [give] them the tools."

The cost for the course is $50 for one person or $80 for two, and it's not too late to sign up – there's still space. It includes a hot, kosher, catered lunch, and everyone who registers by Jan. 24 has the chance to win a Canon Powershot digital camera. A portion of the proceeds from the conference will be donated to Heart and Stroke.

"I want to teach every single kid that I possibly can how to make a difference so our generation will be leaders of positive social change in our communities and really know how to be a generation that gives back to our communities, a generation that knows how to change our world and a generation that cares about our world."

Her second project for 2011, Lemonstock, will feature a popular band still to be chosen, a battle of the bands, and talent and glee group competition. It is being held in June at 99 Sudbury, an event venue in downtown Toronto.

In addition to supporting Heart and Stroke, Amanda plans to use Lemonstock to raise money and collect shoes for Soles4Souls, an organization that provides shoes for people in need.

"By giving [people] shoes we're giving them the power to stand up for what they believe in," she said. "We're going to empower them to make a difference in their own lives.

"It's going to be a really great event, and we want everybody to stay tuned for more information on this exciting event for teenagers."

Canadian pilot witnessed horrors of Bergen-Belsen

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"I was completely shocked," said Brian MacConnell. "I had no idea such places existed."

MacConnell, an 88-year-old veteran of the Royal Canadian Air Force and a resident of Toronto, was talking about his brief visit to the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp only days after it was liberated by British troops on April 15, 1945.

Brian MacConnell in his wartime RCAF uniform.

To this day, Bergen-Belsen, a place of infamy in the annals of the Holocaust, remains an endearing and searing symbol of Nazi crimes.

As many as 50,000 Russian prisoners of war and 50,000 civilians, mostly Jews, died in this camp in northwestern Germany.

MacConnell, a combat pilot who flew Spitfires during World War II, saw Bergen-Belsen when the stench of death still lingered in the air.

"My whole squadron was taken to Bergen-Belsen," he said in an interview last week. "I'm pretty sure we were taken there to tell people what we had seen."

MacConnell's son, Mike, a Toronto high school teacher and convert to Judaism, said his father's visit was arranged to ensure there would be "objective witnesses to the atrocity."

Nearly 66 years on, MacConnell, a retired mining engineer, remembers the visit as if it happened almost yesterday.

He told his story on the eve of International Holocaust Remembrance Day, which has been observed on Jan. 27 since 2005, when the United Nations designated it a special memorial day under Resolution 60/7.

On Jan. 27, 1945, the Red Army liberated Auschwitz-Birkenau, the notorious death camp in Poland where some one million people, many of them Jews, were murdered.

MacConnell visited Bergen-Belsen, originally a prisoner of war camp, shortly after his 402 Spitfire Squadron was moved to an airfield nearby.

Two or three days after the British 11th Armoured Division rolled into Bergen-Belsen, finding thousands of decaying corpses on the grounds, MacConnell and 24 other members of his squadron were bused to the camp in Lower Saxony.

"The survivors had been removed, but dead bodies, 70 to 100, were piled up near the fence," he recalled. "They were all so emaciated, like skeletons."

The Canadians were taken on a one-hour tour. "We were shown from the outside barracks, gas chambers and ovens," he said.

The British army officer who acted as their guide said, 'You fellows probably didn't realize there were such things."

He was right.

"We had heard that the Germans were mistreating Jews, but we didn't know they were being killed. We thought Jews had been shipped to work camps."

"We were in complete shock," he added. "I couldn't believe a civilized country like Germany could do such a thing. I couldn't understand man's inhumanity to man. We were glad the war was almost over."

When the tour was finished, the Canadians were deloused, and MacConnell never saw Bergen-Belsen again.

Born in Toronto and educated in Lindsay, Ont., he joined the RCAF in 1942. After months of training in Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia, he received his wings.

He was posted to Britain in June 1944, just days before D-Day, and joined his squadron in Belgium.

A flying officer, MacConnell flew 25 combat missions over Holland and Germany, bombing railway lines and stations and vehicles as well.

"We tried to disrupt the movement of German equipment," he explained.

Although he had trained on Hurricanes, he flew Spitfires.

Only once did he shoot down an enemy aircraft. "We were flying at about 5,000 feet in battle formation over Germany when I saw a single plane well below us. I pulled out and dove, opening fire on a German plane."

MacConnell derived satisfaction from downing it. "We all wanted to shoot down German planes. That's what we were there for."

With Germany having surrendered to Allied forces, he was demobilized and sent back home. He returned to Canada on Sept. 12, 1945 and married his sweetheart, Emily Barron, whom he had met at basic training, five days later. They were married for 63 years and had five children.

After studying mining engineering at the University of Toronto, he worked in British Guyana and Asbestos, Quebec, before starting a company that manufactured hydraulic equipment. Prior to his retirement in 1987, the government of Ontario employed him as a consultant.

For the past few years, MacConnell has given talks to high school students about his war experiences.

Bergen-Belsen always comes up in the discussions.

"I tell them I saw it. A Holocaust denier wouldn't get anywhere with me."

To MacConnell, Holocaust deniers do not acknowledge reality.

"I put them down as being nuts and unbalanced. I don't know whether they're fascists or not. They could very well be antisemites. There's so much evidence that the Holocaust happened. Survivors have told their stories. There was a Holocaust."

Kids concert planned for Save a Child's Heart

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

Two Toronto women are holding a children's concert to raise money for Save a Child's Heart.

For the second year in a row, Sari Goldman, along with event co-chair Michelle Weinberg, is organizing Sing Your Heart Out, with all the proceeds going to the Israeli charity.

Save a Child's Heart, Weinberg says, "provides lifesaving cardiac surgery for infants and children from underprivileged areas. It's based out of a hospital in Israel."

Last year nearly $20,000 was raised from the concert and five children were helped, Goldman, who sits on the Save a Child's Heart board, says.

"Last year was so successful. We had a goal of raising $10,000 – it costs $10,000 to save one life – but really our goal was to have a great concert, raise awareness and have a good community outcome.

"We surpassed our goal... we were actually able to save five kids' lives. At the time there were five kids that needed little parts of the whole package. One kid just needed transportation, one just needed the post-operative costs."

Performing at the concert this year are Juno Award-winning children's singer Jen Gould and Marky Weinstock.

Goldman came up with the idea for Sing Your Heart Out because she found Save a Child's Heart did not run many events targeting the 30-something crowd.

"I was a new mom at the time, and it's this target audience of 30-somethings with young kids who were not necessarily being included in the different events that Save a Child's Heart was doing," she says. "Families with kids the same age as those being operated on were being passed over.

"Everyone wants something fun to do with their kids, and a kids concert is a great way to get everyone out and have a fun morning."

"I think it's going to be a really great fun event," Weinberg says. "Last year was a great feeling of [the] community coming together to help kids in need all over the world, and hopefully it'll be a great event again this year."

Sing Your Heart Out is on Jan. 30 at Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. Doors open at 9:30 a.m. For more information and to purchase tickets ($20 each or $65 for four), visit www.saveachildsheart.ca.

"סמלנת החיות" ההולנדית היא מסלנת ימין קיצוני שזכתה בהצלחה גדולה בבחירות האחרונות והיא כיום השלישית בגודלה בהולנד.

"אדה"ב היא המעוז האחרון של התרבות המערבית, סוף אירופה מוסלמית"....."בכל רחבי אירופה קמה ועלה מציאות חדשה: שכונות מוסלמיות, שברן בקושי נראים הילידים המקומיים...אלה הם גיטאות מוסלמיים הנשלטים ע"י קנאים דתיים. כיום יש אלפי מסגדים באירופה. בתי ספר מסלבתיים רבים בבלגיה דנמרק מנישים רק מזון "חלאל" (הכשר מוסלמי) לכל התלמידים. בעבר, אמסטרדם היתה מאד סובלנית להומואים ולסביות. כיום הם מוכים באופן כמעט שיטתי על ידי מוסלמים. נשים לא מוסלמיות התרגלו לשמוע שקוראים להן "זונה"..... "היהודים נמלטים מצרפת במספרי שיא, במגמה מהגל הגרוע ביותר של אנטישמיות מאז השלחמה..."יש כיום באירופה 45 מיליון מוסלמים. המספרים לא היו מאיימים אם למהגרים האלה היה רצון להיטמע בתרבה שלנו. המציאות היא אחרת- שליש מהמוסלמים בצרפת לא מתנדב לפינוי האשפה. בבריטניה דווח כי שליש מהמשתנסים המוסלמים מצדדים בשלטון ה'שריעה'....."

אוקיי קורן, הבינונו את הנקדה, ונם לא חידשת לנו משהו שלא ידענו – אז למה לבזבז כל כך הדבה דיו ואויר!

ליהודי סודונטאי היה שכן נוי שנים רבות. יום אחד אמר לו השכן:

"יעקב, אני צריך עצה ממך- פרצו לי השנה לבית כבר שמונה פעמים. האם נם אליך פרצו!" השיב לו יעקב בשלילה.

"יגוץ', יעקב, המכשיר הזה שיש לך על משקוף הדלת- האם הוא חלק ממערכת הבטחת הבית?!"

מצטחק יעקב:"אפשר להגיד שכן...וזהי מזוזה, ובתוכה יש נם תפילת לשלום הבית".

"אתה חושב שתוכל לתת לי מזוזה כזאת!" שאל השכן. שמח יעקב לעזור לשכנו וקנה לו מזוזה.

מקץ חצי שנה בא היגוי, המזוזה בידו, וביקש להחזיר אותה ליעקב.

"מה קרה, דאג יעקב, הפריצות לבתך נפשכו!".

"לא, נאנח היגוי, אין פריצות בכלל, אבל כל היום באים אנשים לבקש תרומות".....

Solving Israel's water crisis, Pt. 2

As Israel looks to the skies for rain, we conclude our look at how the country is trying to make each drop last. Unfortunately, there are no easy solutions.

Public awareness: If you need want to be more water savvy, read the water tips from Israel's Ministry of Environmental Protection including the Ten Commandments for Water Saving in the Garden. They make sense even if you don't live in a desert. [http://bit.ly/isrwat28]

Drip irrigation: Visitors to Israel will be familiar with the plastic tubing that snakes its way through city parks and kibbutzim. The slow drop-by-drop method of watering deposits just enough water above or below surface. Thanks mostly to drip irrigation, Israel's water requirements for apples, bananas and potatoes declined by more than half after its introduction. [http://bit.ly/isrwat30]

In the video Last Oasis, Prof. Amos Banin of Hebrew University of Jerusalem has an unsettling warning. He compares this technology to the life of a married couple. "There is the honeymoon between the irrigator and the land... [but] after some decades, there is an increasing deterioration of the land as a result of irrigation." Throughout the world, artificial irrigation is taking its toll on the land. [http://bit.ly/isrwat31]

Reservoirs and aquifers: The Jewish National Fund is tapping into underground reserves that have never been used before. A large aquifer at Kibbutz Shamir in the northern Galilee could provide 6.6 billion gallons of potable fossilized water each year from one mile below the earth's surface. The water will be piped into the Kinneret and provide the equivalent of six to seven inches to the lake's water level annually. [http://bit.ly/isrwat33]

Rainfall enhancement: Cloud seeding is performed annually between November and April over the Lake Kinneret basin using seeding planes and ground

burners to seed clouds with silver iodide. Rain enhancement has been credited with increasing rain in northern Israel by an average of 13 per cent annually. [http://bit.ly/isrwat34]

Or maybe not. A recent study has poured cold water on cloud seeding initiatives. Professors from Tel Aviv University's department of geophysics and planetary sciences examined more than 50 years of data on cloud seeding in northern Israel and have credited apparent increases in rainfall to changing weather patterns. [http://bit.ly/isrwat35]

Red-Dead: One of the older proposals for restoring the Dead Sea to its traditional level is through digging a canal linking it to the Mediterranean Sea. More recently, attention has turned to a similar project, the Red-Dead Canal, which would start in the Red Sea and travel north, downward through the Arava Valley shared by Jordan and Israel until it reaches the Dead Sea. [http://bit.ly/isrwat36]

The Friends of the Earth Middle East has raised several concerns about the project, including a fear that the "unique Dead Sea mineral composition will certainly be altered by the release of waters" from the Red Sea. [http://bit.ly/isrwat37]

Several years ago, Shimon Peres, Israel's foreign minister at the time, referred to this canal as a "peace conduit" that would be become a great unifying project for the Israel and Jordan. "Water," Peres said, "knows nothing of politics. It flows for all." [http://bit.ly/isrwat38]

Don't forget Jewish day camps

I spent four summers as a camper at overnight camp. While this pales in comparison to friends who returned year after year over a decade, those four summers helped me develop a sense of independence and an understanding of my Jewish self.

Aided by recent investments, overnight camps are growing by leaps and bounds. Federations now offer scholarships for first-time campers, the Foundation for Jewish Camp recently launched six new specialty camps, and an emphasis on training high quality staff has driven a rejuvenation of overnight camping.

The intense, immersive experience of overnight camp builds lasting friendships and creates a safe space in which campers can experiment with new activities at the waterfront or in the synagogue. Camp is not only about baseball or water-skiing. It's also about singing Shabbat songs in the dining hall, learning new Hebrew words, and swaying in a circle around the havdalah candle. For many, overnight camp is the most intense Jewish experience of their childhood.

While overnight camps have garnered much excitement, day camps don't elicit the same enthusiasm.

The impact of Jewish day camp can be just as strong, and in some ways broader reaching, than their residential counterparts. While overnight camps struggle to connect the intense Jewish experience at camp with life at home, day camps have the potential to bridge the two, empowering parents as educators and buttressing the home as a forum for year-round Jewish living. I have visited camps that

Class Act

By Daniel Held

send challot home on Fridays along with the blessings for Kiddush, and others that run family days during the summer and throughout the year.

Jewish day camps form networks of parents. While waiting for the bus in the morning or picking their children up in the afternoon, parents share notes on Hebrew schools, extra-curricular activities and holiday recipes. They organize play dates for their children and further build their Jewish circles.

Day camps are an affordable alternative to overnight camps, engaging audiences who could not otherwise participate in Jewish camping. Especially in the current economic climate, they offer value for dollars spent on Jewish experience.

Too often day camps are seen as the little brother of overnight camps, serving children who are too young or intimidated by a summer away. This perception belittles their educational potential and erodes their ability to reach a broader audience with stronger programs.

In addition to my four summers at Jewish overnight camp, I spent nearly a decade fluttering from day camp to day camp. I went to sports and rocket building camps, camps at municipal community centres and at universities. While these were powerful educational experiences, my family never saw day camp through the Jewish lens reserved for overnight camp. In this sense, we lost out.

As we seek to increase enrolment and fortify Jewish programming at overnight camps, we must share the spotlight with day camps. We must challenge these camps to compete in the broad market of summer experiences and support them to reach their potential as vehicles for engaging underserved communities and fortifying the Jewish identities of both campers and their families.

Ontario students get swabbed

With the growing need for bone marrow transplants, many people have taken up the challenge to help the Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation find possible donors.

Last summer, I wrote about Jeremy Braverman, a York University graduate who donated his bone marrow after he was told he was a match for a 15-year-old girl with leukemia. The call came from Gift of Life, and Jeremy was glad to hear the good news.

"Registering to donate bone marrow is like entering the lottery," Braverman said. "The odds are one in a million that you'll win, but if you do win, your prize is you get the opportunity to actually save someone's life."

With the astronomical odds of finding a match, it is very important to build the registry. Braverman registered with a Gift of Life booth on the York University campus. The booth was put up by the York U chapter of the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi and AEPi, which is continuing to work to build the bone marrow registry.

Dustin Shulman, a senior at McMaster University, decided that with the growing need for donors, it would be a worthwhile to help get names for the registry, and that's how Get Swabbed university challenge was born.

Get Swabbed was initially held at McMaster U, where Shulman and his chapter of AEPi collected swab samples from the inside of the cheeks of willing participants. Samples were kept on file, and if a match is found – and as already mentioned, it is not common for swabs to match – the potential donor is contacted. Then the individual must decide if he or she wants to go through with the procedure.

On Campus

By Justin Dahan

"It's amazing that as a student with nothing much to give, you can join the OneMatch Stem Cell and Marrow Network [which is managed by Canadian Blood Services] and potentially save a life," Shulman said.

Last year, he decided to expand Get Swabbed to 15 campuses, including McMaster University, Carleton University, Ottawa University, Queen's University, University of Guelph, University of Toronto-Mississauga, U of T-Scarborough, U of T-St. George, University of Western Ontario, University of Windsor, Waterloo University, Wilfred Laurier University, Algoma University, University of Alberta, and Memorial University.

Events at these universities took place in early to mid-November and hundreds of names were added to the bone marrow registry. Only time will tell how many donors are found.

Ilan Orzy, a member of both the Israel Advocacy Committee and AEPi in Ottawa, was in charge of Get Swabbed for two campuses, Carleton University, where he is a student, and the University of Ottawa.

"When Dustin contacted me and asked if I wanted to get involved, I decided this would be a great idea for AEPi," Orzy said. "I thought it was a great idea to get many organizations involved, especially those which show interest in Jewish life, or even medicine. It could not have been as big and as worthwhile without those organizations."

He added that "next year we want to take it even further, and bring it to Algonquin College."

Appreciating God's Creation on Tu b'Shvat

Tu b'Shvat appears in a Mishnah in Tractate Rosh Hashanah as one of the four new years in the Jewish calendar. Over the centuries, this holiday has engendered many customs and traditions.

In the 17th century, Rabbi Yitzchak Luria (1534-1572) of Safed and his disciples created a Tu b'Shvat seder that celebrated the Tree of Life.

The earliest published version of this seder is the Pri Eitz Hadar, meaning "The Fruit of the Beautiful Tree." The seder evokes kabbalistic themes of restoring cosmic blessings by repairing and strengthening the Tree of Life and elucidates metaphorically the Four Worlds of Emanation as a tree with roots, trunk, branches and leaves.

During the seder, many Sephardim eat etrogim, since many commentators say that the Tree of Life was an etrog. The traditional Tu b'Shvat seder ended with a prayer that states, in part, "May all the sparks, scattered by our hands, or by the hands of our ancestors, or by the sin of the first human regarding the fruit of the tree, be returned and included in the majestic might of the Tree of Life." While the kabbalistic interpretation of this tree is thus quite specific, the image of the Tree of Life has proven amenable to new interpretation.

Kabbalah teaches us that the fruits one eats can be divided, progressively, from lower to higher, that is, from material to spiritual. Fruits and nuts with inedible exteriors and edible insides, such as bananas, walnuts, and pistachios; fruits and nuts with edible exteriors but with a pit inside, such as dates, apricots, and olives; and fruits that are eaten whole, such as figs and berries.

Sephardi Window

Kabbalistic tradition teaches that eating fruits in this order creates a connection with the Tree of Life that God placed in the Garden of Eden. In effect, one is travelling from the most external, manifest dimension of reality, symbolized by the fruits with shells, to the most inner, spiritual dimension, symbolized by even more than the completely edible fruits, that is, by a fourth level which may be likened to smell.

Considering the deliberate journey that the seder represents, we come to understand that through the seder we are not just fortifying our physical bodies, but rather we are transforming our material beings into spiritual ones in the service of God.

Thinking about these concepts brings to mind a story of the first Karliner Rebbe (1736-1772) and a Chassid. The Chassid asked the Rebbe, "You have an apple, and I have an apple. You make a brachah and eat a slice, and I make a brachah and eat a slice. After you eat a bit, your Chassidim come running to eat the remains of your apple [a chassidic custom known as shirayim], but no one is interested in the remnants of my apple! What's the difference?"

The Rebbe smiled warmly and replied, "You make a brachah in order to eat, whereas I eat in order to make a brachah!"

As we celebrate Tu b'Shvat, a time of special energy in our calendar year, let us resolve to take this opportunity to cultivate within ourselves a greater appreciation of, and our responsibilities for the wondrous world that God created.

Misinformation causes negative reaction

It was this lack of an initial coherent answer from HBC that caused the rumour to grow virally within the Jewish community via e-mail and social networking sites such as Facebook.

At the same time, a pro-Palestinian coalition called Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME) was in the midst of targeting HBC and Sears in alerts to its members, asking them to send e-mails to store executives calling on them to boycott Ahava products. (Sears didn't pull the brand from its shelves.)

The resulting rumour and misinformation caused an initial surge of negative reaction in the Jewish community and by community organizations such as B'nai Brith and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center and the pro-Israel Buycott Israel campaign – run under the auspices of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) by Sara Saber-Freedman, its executive vice-president – all of whom urged HBC to clarify its position regarding CJPME's campaign.

An HBC spokesperson initially told The CJN on Jan. 12 that the company had removed Ahava products purely as a business decision, saying the line was underperforming in sales and would be replaced by another, more profitable product.

"The Bay, as with all retailers, edit their assortments multiple times a year. Ahava is on consignment and from a business perspective has not been meeting expectations. As such the decision was made to de-list it in stores," the spokesperson said

However, on Jan. 13, in reaction to Jewish community outcry over what was reported to be the Bay's boycott of Ahava products, and to clarify its position, the company's CEO, Bonnie Brooks, issued a joint statement with CIC national chair Moshe Ronen and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto saying that HBC would never succumb to political pressure regarding any of its products.

"HBC has made it clear that it has not 'bowed to political pressure' in the past, has not done so now and will not do so in the future. HBC neither subscribes to nor endorses politically motivated boycotts of merchandise from countries with which Canada has open and established trading relationships, including Israel," the company said.

Additionally, HBC said that it intends to re-stock Ahava in the spring, when the brand relaunches with a new look.

"In rejecting the premise of boycott and revealing that it will continue to sell Ahava products when the line is relaunched this spring, the Bay has completely discredited baseless claims" by anti-Israel activists who had, early last week, heralded a victory over HBC to boycott Ahava, Ronen said.

A statement last week by Ahava's North American CEO, Yacov Ellis, confirmed his company was indeed in the process of rebranding its product lines for the North American market, its largest outside Israel.

Representatives from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, CIC and other community groups held numerous talks with HBC senior management last week and were satisfied the company understood the sensitive nature of the issue, Saber-Freedman said.

"Because of the extraordinary outpouring of concern by the pro-Israel community, the Bay has done something, to my knowledge, no other Canadian retailer has done: take a public, principled position in which it rejects political boycott of Israel or any other country with which Canada has open trading agreements," Saber-Freedman said.

"The Bay's reaction is a significant defeat for Israel's enemies."

Stephen Cummings, chair of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) added: "For Canada's flagship retailer to publicly dismiss the boycott serves as an important benchmark for responsible corporate practice. For those organizations engaged in an obsessive campaign to isolate Israel, it represents a resounding – indeed embarrassing – defeat."

The international boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel claimed victory in Britain this week when leading British retailer John Lewis announced it would no longer sell Ahava products.

Prosserman Jewish Community Centre names new executive director

Andrew Levy takes the reins as JCC continues to flourish

By Daniel Horowitz

With every New Year comes change and a new start, so it's no coincidence that as of January 1, 2011, the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre has a new executive director in place to guide the Prosserman as it continues to evolve into one of the GTA's preeminent centres of Jewish life.

For the past two decades, the newly named executive director, Andrew Levy, has been part of the JCC movement; demonstrating exceptional leadership, passion and commitment. As the director of the Prosserman JCC's popular Centre Camp for the past decade, Levy has led the camp in its transition to its present location at Avenue Road and Lawrence while maintaining the quality and spirit of the program that the community has grown to love.

"Being involved in the JCC on a part time and full time basis for over 20 years, I understand – and have witnessed firsthand – the crucial role it plays in the lives of its members," said the 35-year old Montreal native who credits the JCC with making him feel at home when he first arrived in Toronto as a teenager. "I met my wife, Ilana Heimlich-Levy, at Centre Camp; my kids Ethan and Maya attend Centre Camp and are both in the Prosserman JCC Daycare and Preschool. So, not only am I professionally committed to making this facility the preeminent Jewish Community Centre in the GTA, but on a personal basis as well. It has always meant so much to me and to my family."

As the Prosserman JCC enters its second year, Levy is taking the reins at a time when there are many reasons for optimism, among them:

- Enrollment in Prosserman's JCC is up from last year.
- The Prosserman remains the largest Jewish daycare in the city with a 10% increase in enrollment.
- The Goldie Fitness Centre continues to improve the lives of its members on a daily basis.

While Levy is excited and optimistic about his role at the Prosserman JCC, he is particularly excited about some specific recent developments.

"We have just installed an outdoor skating rink, and we invite the community to join us for family skating throughout the winter," said Levy. "Also, I'm excited that BBYO will be moving into the Prosserman in the summer, which will bring an infusion of youth. JCC Chai Sports continues to grow by leaps and bounds, and we currently offer soccer, baseball, hockey, basketball and football youth sports leagues and adult floor hockey and basketball. And, of course, the Prosserman continues to provide families across the GTA with a place to celebrate Jewish holidays. We collaborated with the Miles Nadal JCC and Vaughan's Schwartz/Reisman Centre on a tremendous tri-campus Chanukah event. That success is a model that we will look to continue in the future for other holidays."

Levy is confident that, despite the challenges that face all growing organizations, the Prosserman JCC will continue to flourish.

"The foundation of the Prosserman JCC rests upon its ability to develop, grow and sustain new and innovative programs to compliment our current signature programs and strategic partnerships," explained Levy. "Coupled with life-changing summers at Centre Camp, a significant school and daycare experience and a commitment to healthy lifestyles, the Prosserman JCC can lead the way to a vibrant future which supports Jewish culture through the Koffler Centre of the Arts, community, and education while encouraging and enabling Jews of all ages and backgrounds to engage in the joys of Jewish living."

Professional Leadership team makes gift to Tomorrow Campaign

Donors to the Professional Leadership Meeting Room in alphabetical order: Steven Ain, Richard Cummings, Angela D'Aversa, Ron Eilath (absent), Robin Gofine, Ronit Climan Holtzman, Susan Lynne Jackson, Carol Kassel, Bryan Keshen, Linda Kislowicz, Dena Libman, Lisa Morrison, Stephanie Olin Chapman, Carol Seidman, Gary Siepser, Ted & Liz Sokolsky, Jeff Springer, Yossi Tanuri, and Shirley Worth.

A special group of Jewish community professionals recently came together on behalf of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign. Taking a break from morning meetings and calls, the 19 staff members, many joined by spouses, gathered at the Lipa Green Centre and raised a glass to a unique collective of donors – each other.

From all facets of UJA Federation and from a number of Jewish agencies, they pooled their resources ($10,000 each) – and passion for this community – to name the Professional Leadership Meeting Room in the beautiful new conference centre of the Lipa Green Centre.

"The professional team is leading by example. You should be exceptionally proud," said Leslie Gales, chair of the Tomorrow Leadership Cabinet. "In my mind, this is the most important gift our community has ever received."

UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign is raising $400 million to build and revitalize three incredible centres of Jewish life across the GTA: the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Sherman Campus at Bathurst and Sheppard, and the Miles Nadal JCC and The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life in Toronto's downtown district.

"It is not easy to make this kind of commitment," said Elizabeth Wolfe, Chair of the Board of UJA Federation. "It is a statement of collective responsibility and leadership to the entire community," she said, adding that the Professional Leadership Meeting Room demonstrates that the Tomorrow Campaign is not just about multi-million dollar gifts.

"This is a campaign where the entire community can participate," she said.

Lisa Morrison, Chief, Annual Development for UJA Federation, was one of the driving forces behind the recruitment of donors for the gift. While the conference centre was under construction, she participated in a hard hat tour and "fell in love with the southeast corner." Today, the room is alive with activity, home to many of the more than 3,000 meetings that take place in the centre every year.

"This gift is a real statement of pride we feel in this community and in this Federation," said Morrison.

It is hoped that this gift will inspire others to join forces – and finances – to help build a better, stronger Jewish Toronto.

MPs challenged on development goals

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish, Muslim and Christian students came together last week to challenge members of Parliament to advocate for the United Nations Millennium Development Goals.

On Jan. 11, students from various religious backgrounds at the University of Toronto organized a dinner at the school's downtown Multi-Faith Centre to raise awareness about world development goals that include eradicating poverty and hunger, creating peaceful partnerships, and ensuring environmental sustainability.

Liberal MPs Bonnie Crombie, Andrew Kania, and Rob Oliphant heard presentations from students and community leaders that showcased their collaborative work in advancing the eight United Nations millennium development goals that the world's leading development institutions have agreed to address by 2015.

Tal Shachar, an 18-year-old political science student, who also interns at the Multi-Faith Centre and volunteers with Hillel of Greater Toronto, said that about 80 students, faculty and religious community leaders attended the event.

"The topics which were touched upon were peace, poverty and the environment, and in terms of poverty, the Hon. Bonnie Crombie spoke about affordable housing. That was an issue that hit home for me, because when I was on my way home, I saw a homeless man sleeping... outside and it was freezing. It was just a sign of how important the work we're trying to do really is," said Shachar, who often works with student groups such as the Muslim Student Association and Campus for Christ.

In addition to the speeches, students presented the MPs with a video that showcased the work that Multi-Faith Centre interns have done recently.

For example, last semester, they organized an information booth about the effect of plastic water bottles on the environment, and another event saw volunteers serving meals to the needy.

"All these local events were designed to draw awareness to the members of Parliament about what faith communities are doing internationally to address the UN millennium development goals and challenge Parliament to continue to work towards the goals as well," said Richard Chambers, the Multi-Faith Centre's director.

Shachar said dinner guests were encouraged to sit at tables with people they didn't know and talk about interfaith initiatives and how different faith traditions inspire them to work together.

"The concept of tikkun olam is what motivates me to work with other faith groups. To hear what they have to say is very inspiring," Shachar said.

She added that this event was not the first time she donated her time to a multi-faith event. Last October, Shachar was selected to represent U of T at a conference at the White House organized by the Interfaith Youth Core, a movement that promotes religious pluralism.

"Students from all over the world were there, and we got training on how to engage different faith groups on campus and how to facilitate community service initiatives... Through that conference, I was inspired to get even more involved."

Shachar said she was pleased that the dinner was such a success, but she is always pushing herself to do better.

"It was a successful evening in that we came together to brainstorm ideas, engage each other in conversation and talk about the long term, but we can always focus on the short term as well."

She added that she made connections with the MPs and hopes to work with them on future initiatives.

Shachar also sees her work with other religious groups as a way to open people up to other points of view.

"I'm a Zionist. I can have political views, but I can still engage with people who disagree with me. But we do so in a way that is respectful," she said.

"You always hear about people who don't want to talk to each other on campus, but with the interfaith movement, you do talk about difficult issues, but you're able to do so in a way that I feel comfortable.

"People always ask, 'How can you be a Zionist and be involved in this type of work?' But I am."

September 25, 1923 – December 21, 2010

From the eyes and hearts of his adoring wife and children:

It is with great sadness that we announce the passing of Dr. Morris Erenberg on December 21, 2010 at the age of 87, at the Deer Lodge Centre in Winnipeg, Manitoba, with his family by his side.

Our father was the beloved husband of 58 years to our mother, Miriam Erenberg, and the loving father of Yale (Ellen), Galla (Allan), David (Ronda), Reuven (Elaine) and Noah (Cheryl). He was the devoted zaida (grandfather) of Tyler, Max, Jona, Daniel, Sarah, Leah, Micah and Brina. He was the cherished brother of Joe (Anne) Erenberg and Musi (Sam) Singer, and the adored uncle to Marlene, Barry, Shari, Bonnie and Gayle.

He was predeceased by his father, Max, by his mother, Sarah Leah, and by his daughter, Esther Brina.

Funeral services were held on Thursday, December 23, 2010 at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in Winnipeg, Canada. Pallbearers were Dr. Yale Erenberg, David Erenberg, Reuven Erenberg, Noah Erenberg, Daniel Erenberg, Micah Erenberg and Max Erenberg. Honourary pallbearers were Joe Erenberg, Barry Erenberg, Dr. Allan Horenfeldt and Dr. Aubie Diamond.

Dad was born in Mariupol, Ukraine. He emigrated with his family to Winnipeg when he was just 11 months of age, and like the majority of Eastern European Jewish immigrants, home became Winnipeg's north end.

He attended St. John's High School, but fulfilled his dream of higher parochial education after graduating high school by attending the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary at Yeshiva University in New York, NY. Dad not only acquired two Bachelor Degrees within a 3 year span, but did so with Cum Laude distinction for his Bachelor of Arts, and Magna Cum Laude for his Hebrew Teachers Degree in 1945.

He then returned to Winnipeg where he attended Medical School at the University of Manitoba from which he graduated in 1951, subsequently pursuing a speciality in Anesthesia. He was the Chief Anesthetist at the Concordia Hospital in Winnipeg for 21 years. He then went on to become a Family Physician in the Winnipeg suburb of Transcona for 23 years, retiring from the practice of Medicine in 1995 at the age of 72.

He treated each patient as if they were his only one of the day, making appointments with specialists for his patients while they were sitting in front of him in the examination room, but still able to keep waiting room times to a minimum. Dad was humbly proud of being able to combine the art of humanities and communication, with the science of Medicine, in order to deliver the best care he felt his patients so rightly deserved. His caring attention to all who were his patients was emblematic early in his profession when he utilized his prowess in several languages to provide medical care to many war camp survivors who were unable to communicate in English.

In addition to his successful career in Medicine, Dad had an enduring, lifelong passion for learning, teaching, and counselling, with a particular love for the study and practice of Judaism which manifested itself in his insatiable pursuit of Jewish philosophy and education, serving on numerous charitable boards, in his conducting of the daily synagogue services, and in his renowned talent for Cantorial music.

In all facets of his life, Dad practiced what he preached. And what he preached more than anything was the inviolable Judaic tenet that each human life must ascend one rung higher on the ladder of moral perfection than that ascended by his predecessor, and not merely emulate it. Dad would often be heard telling all of us on many occasions that we were his dividends in his pursuit of perpetuating the Judaic concept of "Tikun Olam" – Making the world a better place.

Dad sought with much zeal to sow within his children and grandchildren the importance of learning and literacy, with frequent reminders as to the difference an education can make not only in the lives of his offspring, but the purposeful difference such education would permit us to make in the lives of those we might have the responsibility of influencing. Indeed, his immutable commitment to learning was evident by the scholarly uniqueness of his many authorships and oratory engagements.

Dad will always be remembered, and forever be revered, for his compassion for people, his brilliance as a scholar, and his righteous dedication to his family, his culture, and his community.

If desired, memorial donations may be made to The Dr. Morris Erenberg Memorial Fund, c/o Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, 561 Wellington Crescent, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, R3M 0A6, Telephone (204) 452-3711.

No man goes his way alone,
All that we send into the lives of others
Comes back into our own."

Crisis in Lebanon underlines outsiders' roles

The Jan. 12 collapse of Lebanon's year-old national unity government following the decision of Hezbollah and its allies to bolt the coalition captured media attention around the globe.

The government had been virtually paralyzed for months ever since Hezbollah issued threats against anyone supporting a United Nations tribunal investigating the 2005 assassination of former prime minister Rafik Hariri. The person most immediately threatened is Rafik's son, Saad, the current prime minister. According to an in-depth CBC investigative report last fall, Hezbollah is likely to stand accused of being behind the assassination – a verdict that is expected to be issued very soon.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

These developments – the government's collapse and Hezbollah's threats – were widely described as the most serious crisis facing the country since the murder of Hariri, and risks throwing Lebanon back into sectarian strife.

Hezbollah has charged that the UN tribunal is a U.S.-Israeli plot, thereby also implying that the western-backed Saad Hariri (who supports the UN inquiry) is acting in their interests.

AFP reported on Jan. 12 that according to Mustapha Alloush, a senior member of Hariri's Future Movement, Hezbollah timed the collapse of the government to coincide with Saad's meeting in Washington with U.S. President Barak Obama in order "to deal a moral blow the United States."

In a statement following their meeting, Obama and Hariri declared that the UN tribunal must proceed "as a means to help end the era of political assassinations with impunity in Lebanon."

According to Bloomberg News, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton who was in Doha at the time "pointed a finger at Hezbollah and its sponsors, Syria and Iran" and quoted her: "We view what happened today as a transparent effort by those forces inside Lebanon as well as interests outside Lebanon to subvert justice and undermine Lebanon's stability and progress."

Bloomberg pointed out that many in Lebanon still blame Syria, which along with Iran supports Hezbollah, for Hariri's death.

This is where Mideast politics, always complex, gets downright byzantine. After all, Saudi Arabia, which fears Iran's reach into the region, joined forces with Syria, which strongly opposes the UN tribunal, to try to broker a deal between Saad Hariri and Hezbollah. While details of the plan remain murky, what is clear is that it has failed, at least for now.

Some Mideast analysts speculated that the Saudis, with the backing of the Americans, were counting on coaxing Syria from Iran's orbit, while others thought this idea naive and doomed to failure from the start. And this occurred while Obama assigned Robert Ford to Damascus as America's new ambassador – the previous one having been withdrawn in 2005 during the "Cedar Revolution" in Lebanon when, in the aftermath of Hariri's assassination, Syria's military was forced to end its occupation of the country it has long coveted.

Obama apparently believes that Ford can play a constructive role in moving Syria away from Tehran. But not according to Michael Young, the opinion editor of the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut. In the Dec. 30 edition of the online news site nowlebanon, Young called the appointment "remarkably foolish."

He drew upon a Wikileaks-released cable in which a former French ambassador to Lebanon warned an American diplomat in Paris in February of 2009 that since the Syrians are masters of manipulating foreign officials without giving any real concessions, the United States should first get something concrete from Damascus before making any formal approaches to the regime. The French diplomat further warned that the United States should be under no illusion that it will move Syria away from supporting Hamas and Hezbollah (and thus, by extension, Iran).

Young agrees, noting that there "is a structural difficulty hindering better American-Syrian relations: Washington wants to engage Syria so that it will give up on alliances that the Syrians will never willingly surrender, because doing so would so weaken Damascus politically that it would defeat the very purpose of engagement."

Don't do this without a lawyer

Family Matters

Family Lawyer & Mediator

Question: My husband and I are separating after six years. We both do not want to go though a lawyer but want everything to be legal. Our house is under my name. I understand that even though my husband is not the registered owner we need to divide the equity 50/50. Therefore, I am going to buy out his interest and give him half of the net equity. We plan to sign separation papers and file them with the local court ourselves, but we want everything to be legal. What are the appropriate procedures?

Answer: The law and procedures are so complex that you both need lawyers (independent legal advice) for such an agreement to be "legal" or legally enforceable. Anyone suggesting otherwise is mistaken. Moreover, asking me to give you "shortcuts" is no different then asking a surgeon to instruct a patient with a gallbladder stone on how to use a surgical knife after pointing out a few diagrams of the lower belly. For instance, some of the many issues a competent family law lawyer will resolve include the following:

1. Is there other property and debts on the date of marriage and on the date of separation? If so, and your husband has much more than you do, meaning a greater net worth over the course of the marriage, then maybe the split on the house equity is only 50:50 after all. For instance, he might have RRSPs that, after taxes, could be worth a great deal more than yours as of the date of separation. If so then the difference in value between the two will affect the split of the house equity. Or perhaps he has a private pension plan whose current value needs to be inexpensively valuated by a pension actuary? Or he might own a yacht in Fiji?

2. If you buy out his interest in the home and he has cosigned on the mortgage then he will want the bank to release him from any continuing obligation. At the very least he will want a written indemnity from you to indemnity him from any lawsuit by the bank if you can't or don't pay as the bank loan becomes due.

3. These agreements are not filed with the court unless one of you receives child or spousal support and wants the payments to go through the Family Responsibility Office;

4. To be legal, you also need to formally exchange current income, asset and liability statements about each other in writing and be able to provide evidence that this has been done.

Acceptance of brain death urged for organ donation

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Six Orthodox rabbis in Montreal, and one in Toronto, have affirmed their belief that cessation of activity in the brain stem is an acceptable definition of death under Jewish law.

They made their position public as the long debate within mainstream Orthodoxy over organ donation took a contentious turn once again. Authorities within this branch of Judaism remain divided over whether a person has died when the brain stem stops functioning or when the heart has stopped as well.

Along with nearly 100 Orthodox rabbis mainly from the United States and Israel, the seven rabbis have signed a "statement of principles" endorsing brain stem death as "a halachically operational definition of death. As such, organs may be removed for transplantation under strict halachic supervision and guidance."

Furthermore, they state that it is "both halachically permissible and desirable and ethically mandated for every Jew to be an organ donor consistent with his or her definition of halachic death." While pressing for the brain stem determination, the rabbis allow that the cardiac definition is also halachically supportable.

The Montreal signatories are rabbis Michael Whitman of Congregation Adath Israel, Chaim Steinmetz of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem, Adam Scheier and Yonah Berman of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, Reuben Poupko of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, and Howard Joseph, retired from the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue and a member of the executive of the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA). Rabbi Whitman said the Montrealers signed on individually and not in coalition.

The other Canadian signatory is Rabbi Aaron Levy, who heads Makom, a self-described grassroots Jewish group in downtown Toronto. Their statement follows a Jan. 7 statement from RCA, with which all but Rabbi Levy are affiliated, intended to clarify that organization's position on the issue. The RCA, which has close to 1,000 member rabbis worldwide, stated essentially that it has no official position and is leaving it up to individual rabbis to decide what is right.

The author of the statement on brain death – Rabbi Dov Linzer, rosh yeshiva and dean of Yeshivat Chovevei Torah Rabbinical School in Riverdale, N.Y – said he wrote the statement because he felt the acceptability of brain death was under attack and that the position was going to be "completely marginalized."

Waiting for a person's heart to stop beating, once they are brain dead, can result in organs that are not usable for donation, Rabbi Linzer said.

There are close to 2,000 people on Canada's waiting list for organ donations, and every three days, one person on the list is going to die, said Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas.

Rabbi Bulka, a prominent proponent of organ donation in the Orthodox community and chair of the Trillium Gift of Life Network, said he wasn't asked to sign the petition, but he told The CJN that brain stem death has been accepted as a halachic criterion of death by "people I highly respect, who have both halachic and scientific knowledge."

Rabbi Michael Whitman

At the same time, he added, he also respects those who have come to the opposite conclusion, but he expressed concern the issue may be a smokescreen for whether organ donation is acceptable within Judaism. "It's lifesaving of the highest order," he said. "This is really a transcending mitzvah."

Rabbi Whitman, a member of the RCA executive committee who has been closely involved with the issue for 20 years, said the RCA statement is "a bit of a cop-out." He noted that it was drawn up by RCA officers without the executive. He said he feels the RCA leadership isn't acknowledging that the renewed divisiveness stems from a "biased" study paper produced by the RCA's halachah committee on how death should be determined. The 110-page document, released last June, was intended for the membership, but was obtained by certain Jewish media.

The paper provoked a strong reaction, including among the medical profession, because it appeared the RCA was moving toward a restrictive stance on organ donation.

Rabbi Whitman calls the paper "biased" in favour of the cardiac death definition, based on some faulty science.

"They worked on this paper for many years, and while it does not argue for the adoption of a policy, it has two very serious flaws: it's inaccurate in the medical areas, and there's a clear bias against using brain stem death as the criterion.

The RCA maintains that the paper is meant as "an informational guide" only. It reaffirmed that almost all rabbinic authorities agree that live and post-mortem organ donation is permissible under Jewish law if it may save a life (or restore eyesight), and is, moreover, a mitzvah.

The rabbis' statement also emphasizes that it's a mitzvah for Jews to donate organs and that even those who believe in the halachic validity solely of cardiac death should offer to make the limited donation that stance allows.

All Jews, these rabbis say, should be encouraged to sign organ donor cards, in line with their halachic definition of death. Rabbi Whitman said the Halachic Organ Donor Society supplies cards that specify under which circumstances the holder wishes to make the donation. He has been a member since the U.S.-based society was founded almost 10 years ago.

The statement concludes that it would be morally and politically unwise for Jews to adopt a double standard on organ donation. "To adopt a restrictive position regarding donating organs and a permissive position regarding receiving organs is morally untenable. Such an approach is also highly damaging to the State of Israel, both internally and in regards to its relationship with the larger world, and to the Jewish people as a whole."

Within Israel, such a dichotomy could worsen tension between religious and secular people, he said.

The statement is signed by such prominent figures as rabbis Shlomo Riskin and Benny Lau of Israel, and U.S. rabbis Avi Weiss and Marc Angel.

Ukrainian groups oppose museum's Holocaust exhibit

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Prof. Lubomyr Luciuk says he's not an antisemite, despite a charge by Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber that Luciuk has been "a one-man wrecking crew driving a wedge between the Jewish and Ukrainian communities in Canada."

Bernie Farber

At issue is how the Holocaust will be presented in the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, a national museum now under construction in Winnipeg. Despite stating that he doesn't want the issue to degenerate into a fight between Canadian Jews and Ukrainians, Luciuk, as the current director of research and former chairman (2007-2010) of the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association (UCCLA), is leading the UCCLA's campaign against having a permanent Holocaust gallery in the museum.

"When I was growing up in Kingston, my father worked for a Jewish employer," said Luciuk, a political geography professor at the Royal Military College of Canada in Kingston. "We always had a positive relationship with the Jewish community in Kingston. It's too bad that this issue has degenerated into nasty personal attacks."

The UCCLA and its sister group, the Ukrainian Canadian Committee (UCC), are upset that a report published in September by a 17-member museum-content advisory committee granted permanent gallery space to only the Holocaust and Canada's aboriginal peoples.

The Ukrainian groups' concern is shared by the German-Canadian Congress, which issued a statement last month noting its "alarm and concern about the museum's dedication of permanent galleries to Holocaust and Canadian aboriginal issues." Congress president Tony Bergmeier called on the museum to be "inclusive and equitable in its treatment... No suffering by one group can be more important than the suffering of others."

While this isn't the first time that the two communities have expressed reservations about a permanent Holocaust gallery in the museum, they have recently joined forces in a new lobbying campaign aimed at persuading Heritage Minister James Moore to set up a new advisory committee to determine the content of the museum.

The Ukrainian campaign features postcards showing Ukrainians behind a barbed-wire fence, highlighting the internment of 6,000 Ukrainians in Canada in World War I as enemy aliens. Supporters are asked to sign the back of the postcard, which calls for a content committee that is "truly representative of the Canadian population, inclusive, fair-minded and nonpartisan," and mail them to the Heritage Minister in Ottawa.

The Ukrainian organizations also want equal exhibition space in the museum for the Holodomor, the famine brought about by Stalinist policies in the early 1930s that has been blamed for the deaths of millions of Ukrainians.

"The response to our postcard campaign has been overwhelmingly positive," Luciuk said. "We have a great deal of support for our position that no one ethnic group's suffering should be elevated among others. That is not the Canadian way."

While Luciuk acknowledged that the museum "can't tell the whole story of every mass atrocity," he said the museum should consider thematic galleries.

"Why not have a gallery called 'Canadian Internment Operations' that deals with Ukrainians and others during the First World War, Germans, Italians and Japanese during the Second, the Québécois in 1970?" he asked.

Farber agreed that the Holodomor was "a terrible tragedy," but he said the Holocaust is on an entirely different level and has had "a profound impact" on Canadians and other peoples.

"The Holocaust redefined the limits of human depravity," he said. "It challenged the very foundation of our civilization. One in every three Jews in the world at that time was murdered, a slaughter from which we have not yet recovered.

"The Holocaust was also the foundation for our modern human rights legislation, and it makes perfect sense that the Holocaust should have a permanent place in the museum. It also makes sense that the plight of Canada's First Nations should also have a prominent place in the museum. What makes no sense is pitting one group of Canadians against another."

> 'No suffering by one group can be more important than the suffering of others'

Angela Cassie, the museum's director of communications, agreed the Holocaust should receive a prominent place in the institution because of its historic role as a catalyst for the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and human rights legislation that followed.

"Our goal isn't to compare the suffering of different groups," she said. "We will be using the Holocaust to show the fragility of human rights. It's also one of the most thoroughly researched areas of recent history. We envisage the Holocaust as the lens through which we teach visitors how to recognize signs of human rights violations and point to actions they can take to combat human rights abuses."

Cassie noted that the Holocaust also affected the Roma, homosexuals, the disabled and others.

"There is a misconception out there that there will only be two permanent zones," she said. "There will in fact be 12 permanent zones and the Holodomor will have a permanent display in the 'Mass Atrocity' zone, immediately adjacent to the Holocaust zone. This zone will feature detailed information on the Holodomor and many other mass atrocities that have taken place worldwide and will provide educational opportunities for visitors to learn more about these events."

Regarding the internment of Ukrainians and others, in a Jan. 6 statement, the museum noted that "the zone examining Canada's Human Rights Culture will look at human rights abuses in Canada's past, including internment operations."

Cassie added that the displays will be updated regularly as more information becomes available. They'll also be interactive and digitally accessible.

Luciuk said that on Dec. 18, representatives of the UCC, Luciuk's UCCLA and the Canadian Ethnocultural Council met in Toronto with five members of the museum, including president and CEO Stuart Murray. At the meeting, the museum reiterated its position that the advisory committee report, while important, is not definitive. And while the museum's content will be contained in 12 zones, including two dedicated to the Holocaust and aboriginal issues, the content of these exhibits hasn't been fixed.

A follow-up meeting involving Ukrainian Canadians and the museum was scheduled to be held in Winnipeg later this month.

Broadcaster's call-in show helps addicts

By JENNIFER LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

Mark Elliot was destined for fame as a radio host from the young age of 15.

"I was kind of like Justin Bieber," joked Elliot, who's now in his late 50s. "I was great at what I did and all the girls loved me."

After finishing high school in Toronto, Elliot worked at several radio stations across Canada before landing a job on a top-rated radio show in Ottawa. "This was the peak of my career but also the start of my downfall. In Ottawa I discovered cocaine.

"No one sets out to become an addict," Elliot said. "We all think we're stronger than the drug – that we can stop when we want to. Of course, that's not true. I became addicted, and I had no idea how to deal with it."

By 1987, his addiction began taking over his life. "I was dying," he said. "I was 6-4 and I weighed 150 pounds. I was losing everything. I was a mess."

To most people, losing their job would not be a good thing, but for Elliot it was the first step of his recovery. "A woman I worked with at the station recognized what I was doing to myself and she reported me, and I lost my job," he said. "It was the kindest thing in the world."

Elliot then moved to Windsor, Ont., where he spent time at a treatment centre that he credits with saving his life.

After his treatment, Elliot stayed in Windsor and began working on a show called People Helping People for the radio station CKLW. Listeners could call in to get answers to their questions regarding their own, or their loved ones, addictions. Callers had complete anonymity – no record was kept of who was calling, and the telephone lines were not under surveillance. "This means that people not yet ready to speak to anyone else about their problems would feel safe and comfortable opening up," Elliot said.

> 'We all think we're stronger than the drug. Of course that's not true'

"We would teach people how to stay sober, or tell them where to turn if they were ready to become sober. I used the same principles I learned during my own treatment. People would call in and thank us for helping them – our show was actually helping," Elliot said.

When People Helping People was picked up by Newstalk 1010 CFRB, a local talk radio station, Elliot moved back to Toronto. "The show was bigger then ever, and because of all the help I was giving people over the radio, they started to ask me if I could do interventions," Elliot said.

Three years ago, he decided to leave his full-time job in radio and founded Intervention Toronto. Now a certified addiction counsellor, Elliot organizes interventions and teaches people how to deal with their crises. "I get calls from a lot of families who think their situations are hopeless. They've tried everything and nothing has worked. I'm their last hope," Elliot said.

The first advice he offers to the families he works with is to love the person suffering from addiction and to "kill them with kindness." This does not mean supporting their habit, Elliot explained. "It just means they need to support them in every step of their recovery."

There are challenges to working in the field of addiction in multicultural city like Toronto. "Every culture handles problems differently," he said. "I need to learn the ins and outs of every ethnicity in order to know what I am dealing with."

However, Elliot recognizes that even though families deal with addictions differently, the end result is always the same – to save lives. "I always say that it doesn't matter what a person's background is – addiction is an equal opportunity destroyer," he said.

Elliot's interventions can be a one-time event or a series of events. He also offers group followup sessions to the clients he counsels for addiction, to help them with problems that develop as they go through the process of becoming sober. These group sessions also allow families of his clients to bond and share information about addiction treatment.

Elliot is proud of Intervention Toronto's success rate, which he says is approximately 80 per cent. "It is really due to the fact that the family is involved from the very first step. The addict never has to go through anything alone," he said.

Once a person suffering from addiction has recovered, he often plays the role of an advocate to help reintegrate them into society. "Every dollar invested into recovery comes back 100 times over," Elliot said. "We can bring these people back into society and help them be productive, tax-paying citizens. These people have put a lot of hard work into changing their life – we need to reduce the stigma associated with a recovered drug user."

Elliot has now been clean for 22 years and wakes up every morning proud of himself for changing his life. "I was able to become a son again," he said." I never thought I could be the man I've become."

People Helping People, hosted by Elliot, airs Saturday nights at 11 p.m. on Newstalk 1010 CFRB.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Ehud Barak quits Labor to form new party

By JONATHAN LIS
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Ehud Barak announced Monday that he is stepping down as Labor party chairman to set up a new party, following months of turmoil within the weakened faction.

In the wake of waning support from his own ministers, Barak is forming a new party called Atzmaut (Independence). He will be joined by four Labor lawmakers – Deputy Defence Minister Matan Vilnai and three members of Knesset – Shalom Simhon, Einat Wilf and Ori Noked.

"We set out today toward independence," the 68-year-old Barak said in his official announcement at the Knesset. "We are creating a faction, a movement and eventually a party that will be centrist, Zionist and democratic.

"The top priority [of this movement] will be first and foremost the state, then the party, and only at the end, us," Barak told reporters.

"We invite anyone who believes in this path to join.

"The State of Israel is faced with tests that are not simple" with regard to policy, defence and society. "We are ready to confront these.

"We are leaving a party and a home that we love and respect its members," Barak added. "Many of those members experienced with us the daily difficulties of the party, and they fell victim to the endless fighting within it.

"We have reached the decision that this anomaly in political life, where they were in essence two Labor factions, had to stop," he said.

Ehud Barak

In a letter to Labor members prior to the formal announcement, Barak's deputy Vilnai wrote: "The Labor faction in Knesset has become an intolerable place, in which it was impossible to conduct a parliamentary life.

"At every meeting, you never knew who was with you and who was ready to quit and join a different party. In order to advance our own ideas, we have decided to separate and go on a new path," he wrote.

"The most difficult part is leaving those friends with whom we have been connected for so many years and who believe, like me, that we are a centrist and Zionist party."

Later, while sitting alongside Barak at the press conference, Vilnai declared: "We simply had no choice."

The decision throws Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's coalition into turmoil, though the number of breakaways is not enough to rob him of his parliamentary majority.

Barak and the four other members of his new party are expected to remain in Netanyahu's coalition. It is not clear whether Labor's eight remaining lawmakers will support the government, in particular in light of recent threats to quit the coalition over the stalled Middle East peace process.

With peace talks in limbo for more than three months, an increasing number of Labor members had urged Barak to pull out of the government because of the impasse. Labor MK Daniel Ben-Simon quit the party last week to protest Barak's decision to remain in the government.

Monday's move by Barak is expected to bring to an end the months of internal strife that hindered Labor's political strength and sway in the government. In a separate statement, Vilnai said that leaving Labor would enable the new faction members to pursue peace "without a stopwatch."

Netanyahu lashed out at the Labor ministers at Sunday's cabinet meeting, saying that the Palestinians were refusing to return to negotiations with Israel because of the party's threats to leave the coalition.

The prime minister also said the Palestinians were hardening their positions because of certain remarks by Labor party ministers.

Splits within parties and the formation of new factions are not uncommon in Israeli politics. In 2005, then-prime minister Ariel Sharon announced that he was leaving Likud to form the Kadima party, along with members of his own party and some lawmakers from Labor. The party today is headed by opposition leader Tzipi Livni, and forms the largest single faction in the Knesset.

Barak, once seen as the heir to slain prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, entered politics in 1995, months after ending an illustrious 35-year military career, which culminated in him serving as head of the Israel Defence Forces.

He became prime minister in 1999, bringing Netanyahu's first term as premier to an end. Barak himself was beaten in a 2001 prime ministerial election by Sharon, which led to a four-year exile from politics. He returned to political life in 2005 in a failed bid to regain the Labor leadership, but became chairman once again in 2007.

Labor ministers bolt coalition

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — With the Labor party reeling at the news of Ehud Barak's decision to quit as chairman and form a faction of his own, all of its remaining ministers decided Monday to exit the government.

Political sources believe that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has been contemplating the dismissal of the Labor party ministers, paving the way for a coalition deal with Barak's new Atzmaut party.

The Labor ministers – Social Affairs Minister Isaac Herzog, Minority Affairs Minister Avishay Braverman and Trade, Industry and Labor Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer – had been seen as unlikely to sign up for a similar agreement and rushed to pre-empt the prime minister.

Herzog was the first to announce his resignation, with Braverman and Ben-Eliezer following suit just a few hours later.

"The time has come to stop lying to ourselves and leave the government which has brought us to a dead-end and forced upon us [Foreign Minister] Avigdor Lieberman and his party with its unacceptable racist discourse, which threatens our democracy," Herzog said in his announcement.

"I informed Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of my resignation from the government. This is a personal move," he said, but added that he expected his fellow ministers to follow suit soon.

Braverman made his announcement about an hour later, telling reporters that Labor ministers had made clear to Barak in recent months that the party must not stay in the coalition so long as the impasse in Middle East talks continued.

"Barak forgets that he put the peace process at the top of his agenda progress," Braverman said. He said that Labor would remain intact and return to the strength that once defined it.

Within four hours of Barak's announcement, Ben-Eliezer called a press conference of his own and became the final Labor minister to resign from the coalition.

Ben-Eliezer vowed to help rebuild the party. "I have no doubt that the Labor party will return soon to the headlines."

He added that he was surprised by Barak's decision. "The truth is that I did not believe that Ehud Barak, who essentially fled the party once, would try to flee again. It's a pity that this is how he is ending his service in the Labor party," he said.

Ben-Eliezer also said that assassinated prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was "turning over in his grave" in light of the party's dissipation.

While it's not yet clear who will take over for Barak as party chairman, Ben-Eliezer made it clear that he had no plans to run for leadership of the party.

Barak's departure had initially been welcomed by some of his former colleagues as a long-awaited chance to rebuild the embattled Labor party, after months of squabbling within the once powerful party. Barak had faced challenges from some senior Labor members, and many supporters were unhappy over his close ties with Netanyahu.

Netanyahu: Tunisia turmoil shows Mideast instability

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The civil unrest that resulted in the ousting of Tunisia's longtime president displays an instability prevalent in the entire Middle East, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said on Sunday.

He added that the situation highlights the need for security assurances in a future Mideast peace deal.

Massive street protests over corruption and unemployment forced President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali to flee the country Friday night after 23 years of iron-fisted rule.

Saudi King Abdullah's palace confirmed early Saturday that the ousted president and his family had landed in Saudi Arabia, saying the kingdom welcomed him with a wish for "peace and security to return to the people of Tunisia."

Speaking during the cabinet's weekly meeting in Jerusalem, Netanyahu said that recent turmoil in Tunisia was an example of "how unstable Israel's region is.

"There are several centres of instability in our region and we hope that peace and security return to the region," he said.

Netanyahu added that the Tunisian unrest also highlights an important issue regarding a possible Middle East peace treaty, saying there is doubt as to whether or not such an agreement would be followed by all sides in the long run, in view of the pervasive political instability in the region.

"We don't know if a peace agreement would be respected, and so any peace deal would have to include on-the-ground security arrangements," he said.

Unrest engulfed Tunisia on Saturday after a popular rebellion forced the president to flee. Dozens of inmates were killed in a prison fire, looters emptied shops and torched the main train station, and gunfire echoed through the capital.

Power changed hands for the second time in 24 hours in the North African country after the president fled the country Friday, with the head of the Constitutional Court declaring that Ben Ali had left office for good, not temporally, negating the prime minister's move to assume power.

Fouad Mebazaa, the former Parliament speaker, was sworn in as chief of state on Saturday. He said he has asked the premier to form a national unity government.

Mebazaa said in his first televised address that all political parties including the opposition will be consulted without exception or exclusion.

Anger over corruption and the lack of jobs ignited a month of protests, but Ben Ali's departure – a key demand of demonstrators – has not calmed the unrest. The protests were mostly peaceful, but after Ben Ali's departure, rioters burned the main train station in Tunis and looted shops.

A fire in a prison in the Mediterranean coastal resort of Monastir killed 42 people on Saturday. The cause of the fire was not immediately clear.

Sporadic gunfire was heard in the capital of Tunis on Saturday. Smoke billowed over a giant supermarket outside the capital as looters torched and emptied it. The army fired warning shots to scare them away, to little avail.

Israel to lease Cdn. firefighting airplanes

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel will lease firefighting airplanes from Canada as it waits to purchase six new ones from the country at a cost of $200 million.

The new firefighter airplanes under construction in Canada will be ready in about two years, CBC reported. The leased planes will be flown by Canadian pilots.

The $200-million deal, which includes the planes and other equipment, was agreed upon Jan. 10, between Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Canadian Defence Minister Peter MacKay during the latter's visit to Israel.

The squadron reportedly will be named the Elad Squadron, in honour of Elad Riven, the 16-year-old fire brigade volunteer who was the youngest victim of the Carmel fire.

The Carmel fire broke out Dec. 2 and took four days to get under control. Forty-four people were killed in the blaze, which burned 12,000 acres of land, consumed five million trees, and destroyed or severely damaged 250 homes. At least a dozen countries in the Middle East and Europe, as well as the United States, sent fire equipment and volunteers to assist in putting out the blaze.

Israeli pilots will be trained on the use of the planes before delivery, according to reports.

MacKay also visited the Palestinian Authority and Jordan during his five-day trip last week.

While in Israel, MacKay met with Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, and the two ministers signed a Canada-Israel Principal Memorandum of Understanding (PMOU) on defence co-operation, according to the Canadian Department of Defence.

MacKay also met with Tzipi Livni, leader of the main opposition party, Kadima.

In a statement after concluding his trip, MacKay said he was glad to have had "the opportunity to meet with key Israeli, Palestinian and Jordanian partners and to reiterate Canada's desire to assist their efforts in bringing stability, security and peace to the region."

Chief rabbi recognizes military conversions

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi reportedly has ordered the recognition of all Israeli military conversions after Rabbi Ovadia Yosef said in a letter that the conversions were valid.

Rabbi Yosef, a former chief rabbi, spiritual head of the haredi Orthodox Shas party and president of the Torah Sages Council, on Jan. 14 issued a letter declaring conversions under the auspices of the Israel Defence Forces to be kosher.

"Concerning my knowledge of the IDF conversion process, the instructors teaching in it, the rabbinical judges and all those involved in this holy task, and after hearing the [three-man advisory committee], which was formed at my request, I have reached the conclusion that by Halachah, the IDF conversions are valid, according to our holy Torah. And the good recommendations of the rabbis, members of the committee, should be implemented," read the letter signed by RabbiYosef that was translated and printed in the Jerusalem Post.

The letter followed the recommendation of a three-member panel of senior rabbis appointed by Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar to investigate whether the halachic standards of military conversions were on a high enough level for him to endorse.

The advisory committee reportedly recommended that those being converted through the military study more Torah and Jewish law and that some of the rabbinical judges employed by the army be replaced.

By law, the chief rabbi's signature is required on all military conversions, which has been lacking since the institution began granting conversions.

Some 4,500 soldiers have undergone conversion under the auspices of the military.

A military conversion bill sponsored by the Israel Beiteinu party was scheduled to be voted on this week in the Knesset Law Committee. The bill would designate the IDF chief rabbi with signing off on IDF conversions, instead of the chief rabbinate.

David Rotem of the Israel Beiteinu party told the Jerusalem Post that the party would not withdraw the bill, despite Rabbi Amar's approval, since the haredi Lithuanian community has said it won't recognize the conversions.

Canada gets failing grade on Nazi criminals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

At a time when other jurisdictions were ramping up efforts to bring Nazi war criminals to justice, Canada failed to launch a single case or deport any of the suspects whose citizenship has already been stripped. As a result, Canada earned a failing grade in the Simon Wiesenthal Center's annual survey of international investigations and prosecutions of Nazi war criminals, said Efraim Zuroff, the organization's chief Nazi hunter.

In a telephone interview from Israel, Zuroff asserted that "something is wrong in Canada." The United States, which pursues similar legal measures against Nazi suspects, has a much better record of finding them, removing their citizenship and throwing them out of the country, he said.

In part, they did so after streamlining their legal system and reducing the number of appeals from seven to three.

"That made a difference," he said. "Canada has not figured it out, and the results speak for themselves."

Zuroff's report, titled, Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals (April 1, 2009-March 31, 2010), found that "the Canadian Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Section of the Ministry of Justice... failed to obtain any convictions or file any indictments... Thus during the past 16 years, since the switch was made from prosecution on criminal charges to the application of civil remedies, the Canadian authorities have initiated 21 cases and obtained eight denaturalizations against defendants residing in Canada, but not a single one of them has herefore been deported. In addition, two defendants voluntarily left the country and six died during the course of the proceedings against them. Three won their cases against the government."

Efraim Zuroff

In an e-mail response to a query from The CJN, government spokesperson Carole Saindon stated, "The government of Canada is committed to tackling crime in whatever form it may appear, and war crimes are no exception.

"Since 1987, the government of Canada has upheld its policy to ensure that this country does not become a safe haven for people involved in war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide. Over this time, the War Crimes Program has taken action in 21 Second World War-related files.

"Canada's war crimes program remains relevant beyond the Second World War through the program's work of screening those entering Canada and investigating and initiating prosecutions and removal proceedings for modern-day war criminals from around the world.

"The government remains committed to identifying, preventing entry, locating, apprehending, prosecuting, detaining and removing those individuals who pose a safety and security risk or threat to Canada."

Zuroff said the program's only success in recent years was the extradition of Michael Seifert to Italy. But that case came in response to an Italian request. Seifert died in custody last year.

While Canada was rated poorly in the report, marks of "A" were given to the United States and Germany. Italy and Serbia earned "B" while Poland received a "C."

"This was the first time Germany got an A," and it's the first time a country other than the United States received an A, Zuroff said. Germany earned the grade by shifting from its longstanding policy of focusing only on German suspects to include people from other ethnic groups and for becoming "proactive" in investigating suspects.

In the period in question, two Nazi war criminals, Josef Scheungraber and Heinrich Boere, were convicted and indictments filed against three suspects, including former U.S. autoworker Ivan (John) Demjanjuk, who was charged with crimes connected to his service as a guard in the Nazi camps of Sobibor and Trawniki.

Joining Canada with grades of F were Australia, Hungary, Lithuania, Estonia and Ukraine.

U.S.-Israel created worm: report

JTA

NEW YORK — Stuxnet, the computer worm that set back Iran's nuclear program by several months or years, was a joint project between the United States and Israel, the New York Times reported.

Israel tested the virus, designed to destroy Iran's nuclear centrifuges at its Natanz nuclear reactor, at the Dimona complex in the Negev Desert, according to the report published last Saturday.

Stuxnet reportedly has wiped out about one-fifth of Iran's nuclear centrifuges, delaying its ability to create its first nuclear weapons.

According to the newspaper, in 2008 the German company Siemens gave the Idaho National Laboratory information to enable it to identify weaknesses in the computers it sold to Iran for its enrichment facilities.

Those weaknesses are what the Stuxnet worm attacked when it was released the following year.

The worm worked by sending Iran's nuclear centrifuges out of control, while at the same time playing back recordings of normal operations at the nuclear plant, meaning that everything appeared normal to the plant's operators, even as the centrifuges were tearing themselves apart.

Neither the United States nor Israel has admitted to playing a role in designing Stuxnet.

Israel Briefs

Conversion bill frozen

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has extended a moratorium on a civil conversion bill for another six months. The bill proposed last year by Avigdor Lieberman's Yisrael Beiteinu Party allows municipal rabbis to handle conversions – few may do so now – and permits only the president of the High Rabbinic Court to annul a conversion. It passed a preliminary reading in the Knesset last summer. The second moratorium will expire July 10. The first had expired Dec. 31. Under the moratorium, Yisrael Beiteinu and the Shas parties agreed not to continue to push the legislation through, and the Reform, or Progressive, and Masorti, or Conservative, movements in Israel agreed not to file petitions with the Supreme Court calling for a framework for non-Orthodox conversions in Israel. Netanyahu also appointed Jewish Agency chairman Natan Sharansky to bring the parties together to discuss the issue. Officials of the Jewish Federations of North America, which has been working with the Jewish Agency and the religious movements on the conversion issue, welcomed the deal.

PM divulges salary

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu makes about $12,300 a month before taxes, he informed the public on Facebook. Netanyahu posted a copy of his monthly pay slip Jan. 10 on the Prime Minister of Israel's page on the social networking site. The prime minister earns a gross salary of about $12,300 a month, but takes home just $4,200 after taxes and other deductions. According to his pay slip, Netanyahu is paid for a 42-hour work week, which is defined as full-time. As prime minister, Netanyahu receives free housing, but money is deducted from his salary for his cellphone, transportation, four daily newspapers and health insurance. After online requests, Netanyahu "decided to provide total transparency concerning his monthly pay slip," read the status posted with the pay slip. U.S. President Barack Obama, at $400,000, makes more than double what Netanyahu earns in a year.

Foreign Ministry strike widens

A strike by Israeli Foreign Ministry employees has broadened, halting defense-related exports and freezing assistance for Israelis abroad. The strike, which began several weeks ago and has added sanctions on a weekly and then daily basis, has included refusing to co-operate with other ministries and institutions such as the Prime Minister's Office, the Mossad and the army; disrupting diplomatic mail service; and refusing to co-operate on visits of dignitaries and state delegations. Diplomats are asking that their salaries be brought in line with intelligence and defence employees. Their union claims many employees have turned to welfare for assistance. Ynet reported last month that some diplomats have cut their service short because they couldn't afford to live in their host country. On Jan. 11, the Foreign Ministry said it couldn't provide assistance to Israelis travelling abroad due to the strike and absolved itself of responsibility for their safety. The previous day, Israeli embassies began withholding security and trade assistance to Israeli firms abroad, in effect halting defence-related exports. Earlier in the week, Israeli ambassadors cut off all contact with foreign ministries, prime minister's and president's offices in the countries in which they serve.

Lawyer to head Ontario Labour Relations Board

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Bernard Fishbein has been practising law in Toronto for nearly 33 years, and during almost that entire span, he's represented the union side in management-labour disputes.

But, like a lawyer who's been named to the bench, Fishbein expects to shed his partisan perspective and adjudicate labour issues in an even-handed manner. Fishbein, 59, was recently nominated as chair of the Ontario Labour Relations Board (OLRB). Although the nomination is subject to legislative review, it's expected his confirmation will be little more than a formality.

A respected labour lawyer with Koskie Minsky LLP, Fishbein taught employment and labour arbitration law at the University of Toronto, served on the Ontario Grievance Settlement Board and was former chair of the labour law section of the Canadian Bar Association.

As OLRB chair, he will adjudicate cases and administer the board. Some 100 people work for the OLRB, largely in the agency's Toronto office. The OLRB has jurisdiction over the Labour Relations Act and its tribunals hear appeals under the Occupational Health and Safety Act and the Employment Standards Act.

In his many years at the bar, "I've seen a lot," Fishbein acknowledged. "I expect the government appointed me because of my experience and expertise."

In announcing the appointment, Ontario Labour Minister Charles Sousa said, "Mr. Fishbein has a strong relationship with Ontario's labour relations community. With over 30 years experience at the OLRB, Mr. Fishbein understands its importance in Ontario's labour relations system. He is a respected labour lawyer who has provided dedicated services to government boards and committees."

Bernard Fishbein

"I've been a union lawyer for practically most of my career," Fishbein said. "It's sort of a polarized area. You don't shift back and forth much. The practice has become so specialized, like insurance law, the defence bar and lawyers representing plaintiffs. This is a bit of a politicized area, so it is rare you see people shifting between labour and management."

Fishbein believes he is somewhat "predisposed to being a labour lawyer."

Maybe it's because his father was "a little shopkeeper," but Fishbein said he has developed a "sympathy for the little guy."

And, although he's never joined one, "I sort of think unions are an important social institution in society."

His practice saw him involved in cases over organizing workplaces, representing labour in negotiations with management, pleading labour's side in grievances, representing workers in collective bargaining and ensuring contractual terms were properly observed.

So how easy will it be to put aside that history and serve as chair of the board?

"It's just like a [recently appointed] judge," who avoid cases involving past clients and former partners, he said. "There will be a period of time during which I'll recuse myself. After a period of at least one year, you can be considered sufficiently neutral."

Fishbein said labour relations law is constantly in flux. When the NDP were in power, "they did a complete overhaul of the Labour Relations Act. When the Tories were elected, they did a major overhaul. And the Liberals have been passing things that change the law, too."

There is often some controversy associated with the field, Fishbein agreed, but "if the government changes the law, it changes the law. My job is to adjudicate the law."

Fishbein said he's eager to take the reins of the OLRB, the biggest and most prestigious such body in Canada. "I think for someone interest in labour relations, it [the OLRB] was described by the outgoing guy as the best labour relations job in the country. I think it will be and it is."

The Toronto native has for 15 years represented the Association of Hebrew School Educators, which comprises most day school teachers. Focusing largely on wages and work conditions, he said "there have been tough negotiations from time to time," but he notes with pride that disagreements have been settled without strikes.

Day school teachers' wages are comparable to those in the public system, he said, but owing to financial constraints, they lag in terms of employment benefits and pensions.

Fishbein has served as president and board member of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and he's involved in his synagogue, Adath Israel Congregation.

Don't raze Dead Sea hotels, dredge the salt, greens say

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Environmental protection organizations and the Dead Sea hotels have found common ground: they hate the idea of razing the hotels and rebuilding them elsewhere.

Both warned of dangers if the plan is pursued, although the plan's aim is to rescue the hotels from drowning as the level of the Dead Sea rises because of Israel Chemicals' mining activities.

The operations of the Dead Sea Works, the Israel Chemicals unit mining the area, and the hotels are both located along the southern section of the Dead Sea, which has essentially turned into a giant evaporation pool. Salt-rich water is constantly brought by canal from the northern section of the sea, which is fed by the Jordan River. But as the water comes, so does silt. The upshot is that the ground level of the southern half of the sea is rising, and therefore, so is the water level, unhappily for the hotels built along its shore.

The state established Dead Sea Preservation in 2008 to come up with solutions. It came up with three. One is harvesting vast amounts of salt from the bottom of the evaporation pool, enough to keep the water level where it is. The second is to build an artificial lake, a lagoon, around the hotels, from which and only from which the salt would be harvested. The third is to raze the hotels and build new ones elsewhere, and that's the plan the hotels and green organizations so abhor.

At a recent joint press conference with the environmental groups, the hotels warned that the process of moving them would reroute Dead Sea tourism to Jordan. Environmentalists from the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI) and the Israel Union for Environmental Defence (Adam, Teva V'Din) called on the government to abandon the plan in favour of stabilizing water levels by harvesting the salt.

The alternatives are being studied by the Dead Sea Preservation Government Company, which operates under the auspices of the Tourism Ministry. The company will recommend to the government which alternative to choose.

Eli Gonen, representing the hotels, said the process would take years. "Nobody will want to visit a construction site," he said. "We'll lose the whole tourism market to Jordan, where new hotels are being built by the Dead Sea."

The state made a historic mistake by neglecting to require the Dead Sea Works to handle the accrual of salt from its operations, they argued.

Nir Papay of SPNI argues that salt will need to be harvested from the Dead Sea starting in 2030, and moving the hotels is a bad idea, so harvesting should start now. Papay also argues that the Dead Sea Preservation Government Company erred in calculating the cost of harvesting the salt.

It won't take as many dredges as the company claims, he said. Everything from the electricity to the construction materials needed for dredging has been overstated, he claimed. Nor would it cause a nuisance to the hotels, Papay said.

Israel Chemicals is owned by the Israel Corporation, which is controlled by the Ofer family.

Names in the News: If you're a film lover, chances are you've enjoyed some of the films of British director Mike Leigh, who was in Toronto earlier this month promoting his newest film, Another Year.

His previous works include Secrets and Lies, Topsy-Turvy and Vera Drake, all of which are extraordinary in their own way. If I had to choose one quality that most stands out, it would be the remarkable spontaneous performances he coaxes out of his actors.

In press interviews, Leigh has described the methods by which he preps actors for their roles. Like Woody Allen, he doesn't give them an overview of the story. Instead, he tells them only what their character is supposed to know so that "they have a healthy sense of the character's point of view."

Although I have nothing but praise for Leigh's films and directorial methods, I am greatly disappointed by reports in the British press of his increasingly vocal support for the left-wing, anti-Israel Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement, which the Internet has inflated into a modern hysteria.

What makes it worse – or perhaps strangely predictable – is that the 67-year-old director is Jewish. Further, he has an aunt in Israel that he refuses to visit. How strange that someone's art can seem so beautifully nuanced and balanced, and his politics just the reverse.

Winston Churchill, the Jews and Zionism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Winston Churchill's name never came up when Barry Avrich was a student at United Talmud Torahs and Herzliya High School in Montreal.

In retrospect, the Toronto filmmaker finds this omission astonishing, given the fact that Churchill played such an integral role in nurturing the Zionist movement and in supporting the establishment of Israel.

It took a book by British historian Sir Martin Gilbert, Churchill and the Jews: A Lifelong Friendship, to awaken Avrich – a member of the board of the Toronto International Film Festival – to Churchill's relationship with the Jewish people and his contributions to Zionism.

After reading Gilbert's book, Avrich was, as he said in an interview last week, "extraordinarily fascinated" and "blown away" by Churchill's regard and respect for Jews and his dedication to Jewish statehood.

So much so that he has made a documentary on the topic.

Unlikely Obsession: The True Story of Churchill and the Jews was broadcast on Jan. 17 by Vision TV. Still more viewers may see his film, as Avrich is currently in discussions to screen it in the United States and Britain.

"I hope it gets a tremendously large audience," said Avrich, who is also a marketing executive. "You can't teach the history of Israel and the Jewish people in the modern era without Churchill."

An Unlikely Obsession – which is based on Gilbert's book, a trove of private papers and newspaper clippings, and outside interviews with such figures as Canadian historian Margaret Macmillan and Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz – is a rounded, well-researched portrait of one of Britain's foremost 20th-century political figures.

As a boy, Churchill, a son of privilege and a future prime minister, read the Bible and developed an admiration for biblical texts, if not for Jews.

His father invited Jewish guests, such as the bankers Lord Rothschild and Sir Ernest Cassel, to their home. Churchill was thus exposed to Jews at an early age and, unlike some British aristocrats, was comfortable in their presence. Indeed, Churchill did not share the casual antisemitism of his peers.

As a rising politician, Churchill represented a riding in Manchester with a significant Jewish population, opposed the Aliens Bill, which was seen by Jews as antisemitic, and protested the outbreak of pogroms in Russia.

Barry Avrich

Winston Churchill, right on steps, poses with Herbert Samuel, Britain's first commissioner in Palestine, in Jerusalem, circa early 1920s.

Churchill, the minister of munitions during World War I, was probably introduced to Zionism after meeting Chaim Weizmann, a Jewish chemist and Zionist luminary who developed acetone, an organic compound used in the manufacture of artillery shells. By all accounts, acetone helped Britain win the war, and Churchill was eternally grateful to Weizmann.

Thanks in part to Weizmann's powers of persuasion, Churchill supported the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which came out in favour of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. But as MacMillan observes, Churchill realized it would cause problems for Britain with the Arabs down the road.

Though he was ambivalent about the Zionist project in Palestine, torn between his sympathy for Zionism and his awareness of British interests in the Arab world, he wrote an article in 1920 in which he expressed support for a Jewish state in Palestine.

Dramatization of Entebbe raid

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Operation Thunderbolt, Israel's daring raid on Entebbe to rescue 103 Jewish hostages hijacked on an Air France plane by terrorists, has been the subject of several movies.

Now, for the first time, the secrets behind the planning of the greatest hostage rescue in history are revealed in an episode of Assault and Rescue airing Jan. 30 on the Discovery Channel.

The episode combines fast-paced dramatization of the rescue's planning and the operation itself with interviews with several of the key players in the drama, including commandos, pilots, strategists and intelligence gatherers.

The exciting action scenes of the rescue and firefight at the airport are quick and sharply edited, at times resembling a first-person-shooter video game.

In June 1976, an Air France flight that had originated at Ben-Gurion Airport carrying 250 passengers was hijacked after taking off from Athens en route to Paris and flown to Entebbe, in Uganda, at the time ruled by the dictator Idi Amin. While the Israeli government considered its options, the Israel Defence Forces and intelligence services secretly started working on a rescue plan.

The hijackers made one key error when they released the 150 or so non-Jewish hostages. This gave the Israelis valuable intelligence information, including the fact that Amin's forces were working with the hijackers and would also have to be fought.

A daring fly-over in a small aircraft by an Israeli intelligence officer also gave the Israelis strategic information.

A plan to land forces in Lake Victoria, the lake on which Entebbe is located, was quickly shot down for several reasons, not least of which the lake was filled with crocodiles.

An air rescue was the only reasonable option, although this was also filled with problems they had to overcome, such as refuelling and landing on a potentially dark and hostile runway. Ehud Barak, who later went on to become Israel's prime minister, was sent on a secret mission to Kenya to try to secure oil for refuelling. (After the rescue, Amin ordered the execution of hundreds of Kenyans living in Uganda for Kenya's role in helping the operation.)

In order to avoid detection by Egyptian and Saudi radar while flying over the Red Sea, the Hercules C130 transports had to fly perilously close to the water.

To compound matters, the Israelis were working against a tight deadline set by the hijackers before they were to have started shooting the hostages, as well as the need for absolute secrecy and surprise.

In the end, the operation was a success and only four hostages were killed in the firefight. The commander of the Israeli operation, Yonatan Netanyahu, the current Israeli prime minister's older brother, was the only rescuer killed.

This dramatization/documentary, produced by Canadian company Frantic Films, is one in a series of episodes that take viewers inside situation rooms, assault staging areas and deadly firefights. This episode premieres on the Discovery Channel Jan. 30 at 8 p.m.

Pop music legend Phil Spector is profiled in biopic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Phil Spector, one of the greatest pop music legends of all time, languishes in a prison today.

He shot and killed Lana Clarkson, a Hollywood starlet turned nightclub hostess, at his palatial home near Los Angeles in 2003. Acquitted in a mistrial in 2007, he was handed a 19-year sentence two years later following a second trial.

It would be fair to say that Spector's imprisonment is a tragedy. The brilliant originator of the "wall of sound" production technique, he will be remembered for the incredibly resonant songs he produced and the talented artists with whom he worked.

His hits are legendary, ranging from Zip-a-Dee-Doo-Dah and Da Doo Ron Ron to Be My Baby, You've Lost That Lovin' Feeling and My Sweet Lord.

His collaborators included the Ronettes, the Ramones, the Beatles, John Lennon, Leonard Cohen and Tina and Ike Turner.

To say that Spector wowed at least two generations of swooning fans would hardly be an exaggeration. A Jewish boy from the Bronx, he was at the centre of popular music in the United States from the 1960s to the 1990s.

Vikram Jayanti's cinematic portrait, The Agony and Ecstasy of Phil Spector, is scheduled to be screened by the Bell Lightbox (350 King St. W.) on Jan. 27 at 7 p.m.

The 102-minute documentary unfolds against the backdrop of his trials and clips of his videos.

More than only a producer, Spector was a songwriter, too. His first song, To Know Him Is To Love Him, the title of which is derived from the inscription on his father's gravestone, shot to fame, selling more than a million copies within a year.

In his heyday, almost whatever he touched turned to gold. But if Spector was a lion in a recording studio, he was a mouse during a portion of his adolescence.

Odd and definitely different, he had an unhappy childhood (his father committed suicide) and was a loner in high school, snubbed by what he describes as the "stuck-up clique."

Treated contemptuously, he burned with anger and rage. The guitar saved him, vaulting him from a nobody to a valued member of a band, the Teddy Bears, who recorded To Know Him Is To Love Him.

Phil Spector

That was followed by, among memorable songs, Pretty Little Angel Eyes, Every Breath I Take and Uptown.

Though his songs were bouncy and infectious, with the pursuit of romantic love at their core, they were fringed by such dark sub-themes as abandonment, alienation and pain.

In a good part of this film, he is interviewed in his mansion. Seated on the edge of a white sofa, he wears a black pinstripe suit and a fire engine red shirt. His wig, styled in a pageboy cut with bangs, is dyed apricot gold.

He is also filmed in court, looking detached, nervous and morose. He rarely blinks, his eyes a window into a troubled and unstable life.

Rather than recounting Spector's story in conventional chronological order, Jayanti unspools it in fragmented scenes. From my point of view, he dwells too excessively on the trials rather than on his astonishing career, for which he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

Like many people in the entertainment industry, Spector is self-absorbed. Above all, he seems in pain. "Pain is just there, it's constant," he says. "Hurting is a natural phenomenon with art. It comes with the music."

No shrinking violet, he has an enormous ego, comparing himself to immortals such as Michelangelo, Bach and Modigliani.

Throughout the interview, he badmouths contemporaries like Tony Bennett and Paul McCartney.

Complex, difficult and brooding, Spector is definitely a piece of work, and this is how Jayanti portrays him in The Agony and Ecstasy of Phil Spector.

Churchill supported Israeli statehood

During the 1930s, he condemned Adolf Hitler's aggression and railed against antisemitism in Nazi Germany. After becoming prime minister in 1940, Churchill virtually ignored the 1939 British White Paper, which drastically restricted Jewish immigration to Palestine.

During the Holocaust, he wanted to bomb railway tracks leading to the Auschwitz death camp.

After right-wing Zionists assassinated Lord Moyne, a British official in the Middle East, Churchill grew still more ambivalent about Zionism. But he continued to support the concept of Jewish statehood, and after 1948, when he was leader of the opposition, he urged Britain to recognize Israel.

Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, recognized Churchill's contribution in keeping Zionist hopes alive. Churchill had faith in Zionist aims and supported Zionism to the best of his ability.

"There ought to be a gigantic statue of Churchill right in the middle of Jerusalem and Tel Aviv," Dershowitz says. "Without Churchill, there would not be an Israel today."

Avrich basically agrees with this assessment. Although Churchill always hewed to an agenda based on British colonial interests, he was a friend of the Jewish people and was completely sincere in his support of Zionism.

Witty literary miniatures with Jewish characters

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The first several chapters of David Homel's sixth novel Midway (Cormorant) are written with such sure-footedness of structure as to float the promise of a story that would really be going places.

The protagonist is Ben Allan, a middle-aged Montreal college professor who writes an award-winning paper on an obscure 19th-century psychological condition called dromomania, an uncontrollable urge to wander. His inner circle consists of a crusty old widower father, Morris, who lives in a seniors' residence; his art-therapist wife, Laura, and TV-addicted teenage son, Tony; and Willis Barnstable, his collegial friend who, having caused a sexual fracas on campus, yet advises him on political correctness.

Both Ben's father and son seem to reside in a mental fog, a condition that Ben, midway between the two, may also be experiencing. When a dim bulb named Carla McWatts comes to interview him for a college newspaper, Ben seems to lose his familiar moorings and contemplates an affair, seemingly just for the sake of shaking himself out of his stupor.

Homel writes with intelligence and humour; the way that Ben and Carla keep missing each other, like two nocturnal vessels on a vast ocean, is comical.

Ben's deep satisfaction at inhabiting her empty apartment without consummating their relationship signals that there is much more than a case of the seven-year itch at play here. (He also spends oodles of time hanging out at his father's place.) A reservoir of middle-aged angst, Ben is desperate for some new vistas and secret worlds to explore.

While ever elusive, Carla draws him into a weird little psycho-drama that takes over the rest of the novel and transforms it from the outward-bound journey that the reader expects into a frankly strange and confused inner journey with sharp gothic overtones (mad doctor, secret dungeon, dazed inmates, mysterious females, allegorical halls of mirrors).

I admit that Ben's fascination with dromomania had created an expectation in me that he would walk away from his life; not unlike, say, the middle-aged protagonist in Anne Tyler's masterful 1995 novel Ladder of Years, who unexpectedly walks away from her husband, children and luggage at the beach, then sets up a parallel life for herself in another town. There is, alas, no such exterior action in Midway.

Like the little boy who wants to run away from home but is not allowed to cross the street, Ben pursues his psychic quest around his own town on evenings and weekends. Midway into the novel, part of me began humming: Get on the bus, Gus, make a new plan, Stan, drop off the key, Lee, and get yourself free. But that just didn't happen.

Don't get me wrong: Homel has crafted many sharply drawn scenes and much good dialogue, and he possesses a wonderful Nabokovian sense of play. But characters must change in a fundamental way if a story is to have meaning, and the only discernible change in Ben Allan at the end of Midway is that he develops a nervous tic.

Like Midway, Adam Mansbach's The End of the Jews (Spiegel & Grau) is a witty literary miniature with Jewish characters.

Published in 2008, it tells the story of three interlocking characters – a grandfather and grandson both named Tristan Brodsky, and Nina Hricek, a teenage photographer in Czechoslovakia. The narrative unfolds in the present tense with as many twists and turns as improvisational jazz. In fact, jazz and jazz musicians play a prominent part in the story, and – as is said of good jazz – the writing at times seems to be "really cooking."

In one memorable scene, the younger Tristan's parents drop him off at Tristan the Elder's place, needing some respite from their teenager, hoping the old man will help tone down his wild excesses. But, possessed of a spark of rebelliousness himself, Tristan pours Tristan a drink, then gleefully accompanies him on a graffiti-painting spree.

Decades earlier and half a world away, Nina lives with her mother in Prague after her Refusenik father has been allowed to travel to the West. He was supposed to get a job and send for them, but instead he abandons them and disappears. Years later, Nina is hired as a photographer for a touring jazz band, then escapes her mother for America. Eventually, she finds her father with a new wife, working at a small college in California. They mean nothing to each other anymore.

Through plot and dialogue and lyrical writing that aspires to poetry, Mansbach brings out the magic of the moment in delightful and unexpected ways. He moves the focus from one to another of his three protagonists until their stories merge. As for the novel's strangely over-reaching title, it is seemingly a comment that in the spontaneous world of action, tradition-bound Judaism acts as a wet blanket, taking the fun and spontaneity out of life.

Morris Allan, the elderly character in Midway, has a similar complaint when he harangues a group of chassidic Jews on the streets of Montreal because tradition has forced them to sweat it out beneath heavy black coats on a warm day. It is this shared tendency to complain that definitively brands both Homel and Mansbach as modern Jewish writers.

Altshuller backstops Team Ontario to gold medal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Team Ontario rode goaltender Daniel Altshuller's hot hand to a gold medal victory in the recently concluded 2011 World Under-17 Hockey Challenge in Winnipeg.

Altshuller, who was profiled in the Jan. 6 CJN, got the call in each of Team Ontario's five round-robin and playoff games. Team Ontario defeated Team USA 5-3 in the final, exacting a measure of revenge for last year's 2-1 championship game loss. Altshuller, who backstops Nepean Raiders of the Central Tier 1 Junior A Hockey League (CHL), faced 21 shots in the game.

He and Team Ontario were pushed to the brink in the semifinal, pulling out a 2-1 win over Quebec in overtime. Altshuller faced 25 shots, including a barrage in the second period when Ontario was outshot 12-3.

Altshuller allowed only 10 goals in five games, including one shutout, as Team Ontario went through the tournament undefeated. His gaudy numbers included a .924 save percentage and a 1.66 goals against average. Going into the tournament after 27 games in the CHL, Altshuller sported a .916 save percentage and 2.89 goals against average. He was one of only two players on Team Ontario who did not play in the major junior Ontario Hockey League (OHL).

He was named CHL Rookie of the Month for November after he helped turn around the Raiders' season, moving them from 11th place in the league to a tie for fourth.

Daniel Altshuller

Broadcaster remains true to his Toronto roots

By BEN FISHER
Special to The CJN

Even as he assumes his new post as lead play-by-play announcer for ESPN's Sunday Night Baseball telecast, Dan Shulman is hardly ready to leave his Canadian roots behind him.

"Toronto is home for me," he said. "It's where I met my wife, it's where my kids grew up. That will never change."

The 46-year-old, who was recently tabbed for the much-coveted sports broadcast position previously held by Jon Miller, has retained his Canadian citizenship and continued to reside in his Thornhill home while gaining increasing prominence and critical praise on both sides of the border.

In fact, it was Shulman's hometown that served as a platform for his rise in sports media, as he broke in with the Fan 590 radio station (then known as CJCL) and later transitioned into a job at TSN. The University of Western Ontario graduate first gained national recognition as the play-by-play voice of Blue Jays baseball, alongside analyst Buck Martinez, whom he credits with helping his development in the industry.

"I owe a great deal to Buck," said Shulman. "I was a raw rookie in the early going, and he taught me a ton about the industry and the sport, itself, and was tremendous to work with during our six years together."

Just as Martinez would go on to a big league managerial job with the Jays, Shulman was destined for bigger things ahead. After working part-time with ESPN during his TSN days, he moved full time to the network, which is based in Bristol, Conn., to cover baseball, NCAA basketball and the NBA.

Shulman's broadcast career has seen him cover a wide range of marquee sporting events such as the 1994 Winter Olympics, the World Series, the MLB all-star game and the NCAA March Madness tournament. Not bad for someone who got his degree in actuarial science.

Shulman's rapid rise was perhaps best recognized by Sports Illustrated. Referring to him as a "pro's pro," the celebrated weekly sports magazine named him its top national play-by-play announcer of the 2000s, ahead of the likes of Al Michaels, Joe Buck and Miller.

"To just be included among some of the greatest talents in our industry was an honour," Shulman recalled. "To actually be seen as the best was something else."

Clearly ESPN would agree with SI's choice. Shulman broke the news about the Sunday Night Baseball job on Bob McCown's Prime Time Sports (yet another example of his strong local roots), and is thrilled to step into what he views as a much-revered position.

"Somebody I work with said to me, 'You're replacing Cal Ripken,'" Shulman said in reference to taking the position that Miller held for 21 years. "I never thought of it in those terms, but I'm replacing a guy who's the only guy who's ever held the job. I'm only the second guy to get this job."

Shulman will share the Sunday Night Baseball broadcast booth with former manager Bobby Valentine and former Cy Young-winner and longtime close friend Orel Hershiser. Shulman and Hershiser won't need much time to adjust to one another, having been paired together for the past two seasons on the network's Monday Night Baseball broadcast.

"Orel and I have known each other for a long time now, and I think we play off of each other really well," Shulman said. "He's one of the smartest people I know, and I can't wait to see what he, Bobby and I can produce."

Neither can Shulman's many fans, both north and south of the border.

YouTube videos let viewers enjoy junk food vicariously

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

Have you ever wanted to see someone eat time? What about a gun, a cult or a library?

Well, the Epic Meal Time crew doesn't eat any of that, despite what they say in their videos. Instead they eat pizza covered in onion rings, fries, burgers and chicken nuggets. Then there's the Meatball Deathstar, a meatball approximately the size of a soccer ball stuffed with tortellini, meat sauce and vegetables, placed on a huge round of garlic bread and smothered in extra meat sauce.

Those meals – and many like them – are all part of Epic Meal Time's series of weekly videos of the crew making and eating food that's extremely high in calories and fat. In less than three months, the videos have garnered more than 10 million views on YouTube.

Harley Morenstein, 25, along with a few of his friends, all Montrealers, came up with the idea for Epic Meal Time based on personal experience.

"Normally, it was just called Sunday," he says. "Then [me and my friends] decided to start filming it and showing it.

Harley Morenstein, the host of Epic Meal Time, with some of the ingredients for the Meatball Deathstar.

"We all love eating. I don't know if you can tell on camera, but I'm like 6-6 and 260 pounds – I'm a big guy.

"So we've always been eating a lot, and we decided to get more creative with it and film it. At the end of the day, it's basically just myself and my partner Sterling [Toth] – he's the guy holding the camera in the videos. We're the creative forces behind it."

Epic Meal Time's first culinary creation, the Worst Pizza Ever, is topped with delicacies from various fast-food chains. It has 5,210 calories and 286 grams of fat.

Then there's the Angry French-Canadian, also known as "the greasiest sandwich in Canada." Picture 50-cent hot dogs and a few pounds of poutine piled onto French-toasted baguettes with a Quebec maple syrup topping. This very Canadian concoction weighs in at 5,343 calories and 207 grams of fat.

When asked about the most disgusting thing he's eaten with Epic Meal Time, Morenstein says he initially doubted the wisdom of combining poutine with maple syrup.

"It was delicious, but initially I thought it was going to be gross," he says. "It ended up being good, and not only that, I've remade that sandwich personally for myself and I put mustard on it as well. And it was excellent."

These creations are nothing, however, when compared to Epic's first stab at dessert. Black Legend is the "fully loaded crepe" that will "take your sweet tooth for a magical ride through Candy Land," Morenstein says in the video.

The chocolate crepe is stuffed with deep-fried pastries, including apple pie, cinnamon twists and McDonald's McFlurry balls that are covered in chocolate-chip-cookie crumbs and deep-fried. It's held together using "chocolate glue" – chocolate cake and icing – and is 19,177 calories and has 684 grams of fat.

A friend of the Epic Meal Time crew, "Muscles Glasses," prepares to eat the Angry French-Canadian sandwich.

While he thought Epic Meal Time would be an online hit, Morenstein had no idea it would become as popular as it has.

"When we first started [Epic Meal Time] we did a pizza video, which was like we put hamburgers on a pizza... At the time I [said], 'This will probably be pretty popular.'

"I was just like let's prepare [more] in case it happens to be popular. And it was. Did we think it would get over 10 million views in three months? No.

"Especially now in the New Year, I can only imagine that it'll increase more so [in popularity]," he continues.

"People are trying to diet, people are trying to be health conscious. There's a lot of negative media attention on obesity problems, and paying attention to organic food. People are trying to change their lifestyles – less McDonald's, less KFC Double Downs, more whatever it is that would be healthier, but at the end of the day people still love junk food. I think a lot of people vicariously eat it all through us."

For those who want to make the Epic creations at home, Morenstein says a cookbook is in the works, because they get a lot of people asking for the recipes. Other plans for expansion, he jokes, include "Epic Meal Time in Imax 3-D, directed by James Cameron."

As for where the ideas for their Epic creations come from, Morenstein says it's usually pretty random.

"Maybe I'll be sitting there and it'll come to me while I'm daydreaming. Or I'll be inspired by something and put in a phone call to my buddies. [Then] we'll start to say 'and then we'll do this, and then this and this' until we've taken something that was a crazy idea and mutated it into something even crazier. I think we're pretty creative guys, and together as a bunch we get even more creative."

Reducing Toronto's environmental footprint

Sustainable Jew

By Fred Winegust

This column will look not only at environmental issues from a Jewish perspective, but will also highlight what we're doing about it, interesting perspectives from a leadership perspective and how people are either making money, reducing costs or complying with various regulations.

I've recently been participating in ClimateSpark, a "crowdsourcing" challenge. [http://bit.ly/ClimateSpark] This competition was designed by the city-run Toronto Atmospheric Fund (TAF) for entrepreneurs with creative ideas on how to reduce the environmental footprint of Toronto and the surrounding area.

Crowdsourcing is the outsourcing of tasks to an undefined, large group of people. Our environmental footprint is the measurable impact of our consumption of electricity, natural gas and water, as well as products and services.

ClimateSpark has succeeded in building a community of more than 500 registrants, of which almost 200 actively review and rate business ideas. Of the 33 companies participating, the top nine will compete, and the winner will get $10,000.

One of the bloggers, Matthew Leibowitz, an investment director at BEST Funds, a venture capital and private equity firm, raised an interesting point in his blog entry. He wrote that "what excites investors today" is the opportunity to "expand outside their backyard." [http://bit.ly/tsjjan02]

I wonder if Leibowitz knows that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is twinned with the Eilat-Eilot region in Israel, which is becoming a hotbed for sustainability entrepreneurs. The fourth annual Eilat-Eilot Renewable Energy Conference, Feb. 22 to 24, sponsored by federation, will bring together sustainability experts from around the world . [http://bit.ly/tsjjan03]

Wouldn't it be interesting if the top three finalists got to pitch to investors attending the conference? What if top Israeli entrepreneurs were able to bring their innovations to Toronto to offer a counterpoint for Jewish business students on campus during Israeli Apartheid Week. This would allow the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce (CICC) and the Israel Economic Mission to Canada (IEMC) to use this crowdsourcing opportunity to enhance two-way trade between Canada and Israel.

With a new federal environment minister and a strongly engaged Ontario government, as well as elections looming for both, having Canadian entrepreneurs pitching in Israel and Israeli entrepreneurs pitching in Canada, and demonstrably increasing two-way trade, could be a win-win for all political parties.

I'm concerned that TAF's innovative work fall victim to city budget cuts, even though they don't draw a penny from the tax base. TAF has planted a wonderful seed – read what they have done at http://bit.ly/tsjjan04, and participate in ClimateSpark by commenting on the business value of the solutions proposed by local entrepreneurs. [http://bit.ly/tsjjan05] Then, contact your local councillor to say why you believe the TAF is important.

Also, please contact federation, the CICC and the IEMC to tell them that you support this creative way of expanding the trade link between Toronto and Eilat.

Several Orthodox Jewish schools in Montreal are not complying with the law because they aren't adequately teaching the province's core curriculum, according to an advisory body to the education minister on private education.

In its latest annual report, the Commission consultative de l'enseignement privé (CCEP) also notes that most of these schools, and some mainstream Jewish schools, employ staff who aren't legally qualified to teach – that is, they don't have a licence issued by the education ministry.

A Montreal radio show, Money and Business, is managing to attract an increasing level of buzz. One of the reasons seems to be its host, financial consultant Samuel Ezerzer, who despite no previous broadcasting experience when the show went on the air in October 2009, has a style that's been praised as smooth, polished and professional.

Children are from another time

Urban Writer

By Avrum Rosensweig

A child can ask questions that a wise man cannot answer. – Author Unknown

My son, Noah, asked me, "Daddy, what happens if one day I can't stop laughing?" It was a reasonable question. After all, my little boy knows the saying, "I laughed off my head" (sic) in reference to something he finds very funny.

So really, who's to say, until you really can say, that it's not possible for somebody to tell us a hilarious joke that tickles our funny bone with great intent, causes us to giggle, then chortle, then laugh uproariously – really out of control?

Really, if you didn't know yet that the giggles will eventually stop, I think it's fair to consider that our heads will just roll right off our shoulders, and even out the door, down the street, past a shul and end up in a mound of snow by the edge of someone's veranda?

My boy thinks about stuff. He wonders.

One day his favorite number was 9254. (And why shouldn't it have been? Some people claim 2-1/2 as their favorite numeral. Others refrain from stepping on cracks on the sidewalk for the first dozen years of their lives.)

Recently, he told me that nobody can teach him anything. I asked, "Noah, can you teach yourself?" and he replied, "No, Daddy, I can't. Nobody can." What he meant was that he is himself and nobody can change that. True.

I'm truly fascinated by the mind of a 4-1/2-year-old. Where do Noah's ideas come from? What happens in his sophisticated, lucid little mind that compels him to paint a model car in reds tinted with black, dipped in silver, and rounded out with spliced up decals, then stare at it and ask, "Isn't this good Daddy?" And I respond, "Yes it's beautiful, Noah," because it is.

If you or I were to paint a little plastic Corvette that way, our vision and taste might be questioned, but not Noah's. That's his masterpiece. To him, it's Van Gogh's Sunflowers or Monet's Water Lily Pond – alive, compelling and a gigantic slice of truth.

The Talmud says, "Do not confine your children to your own learning, for they were born in another time." At first blush, this seems to be saying that when a parent teaches a child, he or she should be cross-generational about it. In other words, the Talmud is instructing parents to delve into the mindset of a child, to try to understand the differences in premises and starting points.

I'd like to add to this explanation. Perhaps what the Talmud is saying is that you should recognize that your child is from another place, and indeed "another time." See that when they are little, in particular, they are closer to God, and, therefore, their thinking, their creativity, sits on the zenith of a rainbow, or moves on the back of a marsupial platypus – the way ours used to

That's my son, Noah River. That's children. They see the world differently than we do, as their eyes are clearer and their minds are frenetically and crazily unambiguous. Listen closely to little people. Respect them, because they come from another time, and they have a message to share with us. It's polka-dotted and rolls awkwardly, but then stands still and tall like a giraffe, like the angels.

IDF exonerated in flotilla incident

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday expressed satisfaction with the findings of the Turkel Commission, the Israeli inquiry that probed the Israel Defence Forces raid on a Gaza-bound ship last May, which found that Israeli soldiers acted in accordance with international law during the operation.

"The truth is simple," said Netanyahu. "IDF soldiers defended themselves and their country. It is not only their privilege, but also their duty, and the State of Israel stands behind their actions."

Netanyahu added that every time Israel needs to defend itself, it's charged with committing war crimes.

"It also happened when we came to enforce the blockade on Gaza," he said. "The IDF soldiers boarded the [Turkish ship Mavi] Marmara with courage and restraint. The goal was to enforce the naval blockade on Gaza.

"The whole world saw how our soldiers were attacked and were forced to defend their lives. We established an independent panel of inquiry, and the report that it submitted clearly shows that both the blockade on Gaza and its enforcement are legal, and that IDF soldiers acted legally and in self-defence," Netanyahu said.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak also lauded the Turkel Commission's report, saying its findings prove Israel is a law-abiding nation.

The first part of the panel's report, released Sunday, found that the Israeli soldiers who took part in the raid last May, which resulted in the deaths of nine people on the Mavi Marmara, had acted in self-defence. It also determined that Israel's 3-1/2 year blockade of the Gaza Strip does not break international law.

Former Israeli Supreme Court judge Jacob Turkel submits the report of the six-member commission of inquiry that he chaired to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in Jerusalem. The commission investigated the clash between Israeli navy commandos and passengers on the Turkish ship the Mavi Marmara last May 31 in which nine Turkish nationals were killed. Retired Canadian Brig.-Gen.Kenneth Watkin was one of two observer members on the panel. [Israel Sun photo]

Attacks on Montreal synagogues went unreported in January 2010

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Police in Cote St. Luc have revealed that "four or five" area synagogues were hit by vandals throwing rocks through windows a year ago using the same modus operandi as the attacks earlier this month, but Jewish community leaders decided not to make the news public.

"It was decided to keep the situation low key" to give police a chance solve the case, but no arrests were made, said Cmdr. Sylvain Bissonnette of Station 9.

He said the similarities between the attacks last year and this year point to the same perpetrator.

"We know the modus operandi, that's for sure," Bissonnette said in an interview last week with The CJN.

As in January 2010, "we know that it was only one individual [committing the attacks]. We have an idea of the model [of the car. At each location], the driver of the car got out, went to the trunk, opened it, took the rock and threw it at the window, closed the trunk and got back into the car."

He said the method used in this year's attacks matched last year's almost exactly. In the 2010 incidents, rocks were also thrown through the windows of several synagogues, also in the dead of night, using what police think might be the same car.

Bissonnette said in both years, "almost the same [type of] rocks" were used.

As well, four months before the January 2010 vandalism, in September 2009, three synagogues in Cote St. Luc were hit, but video evidence was negligible. That vandalism was reported in the media.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, chair of Federation CJA's security co-ordinating committee, acknowledged the January 2010 vandalism, but said the affected institutions themselves preferred that the incidents not be made public.

Speaker Takes Flight

TORONTO — Robert Deluce, president and CEO of Porter Airlines, spoke at a United Jewish Appeal event Jan. 26 at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel. He discussed the story of Porter Airlines, the regional airline he founded in 2006 that's run mainly out of Billy Bishop Toronto City Airport.

Rutgers Returns Art

BALTIMORE — A painting looted by the Nazis in Holland was returned to the heirs of its Jewish owner by Rutgers University. The 1509 work Portrait of a Young Man by German painter Hans Baldung Grien, was returned Jan. 14 to Simon Goodman of Los Angeles, grandson of a Dutch banker whose extensive collection was seized by the Nazis in Holland in May 1940. The university had spent a year tracking the origins of the portrait. The painting was part of a group of seven works that the Goodmans traded to a German art dealer representing Adolf Hitler in return for safe passage out of Nazi-occupied Europe. Instead, Nazi officers looted the art and sent the owners to death camps, where they perished. The painting was donated by then-owner Rudolf Heinemann to Rutgers in 1959.

High School Closing

BALTIMORE — A Baltimore Jewish day school will close its high school division at the end of the school year due to cash flow and debt problems. Yeshivat Rambam, which opened 10 years ago, said Jan. 15 that it would close its boys and girls high schools while trying to boost enrolment in its middle and elementary schools, as well as its early learning programs, the Baltimore Jewish Times reported. Sixty-three students are enrolled in the boys' high school and 33 in the girls' school. Total enrolment at Yeshivat Rambam is 350. Working to keep the high school going could jeopardize the entire school, its president said.

Letter Bomb Scare

NEW YORK — Six floors of a building in New York City housing an Israeli bank were evacuated because of a letter bomb scare. First responders gave the all clear Jan. 19 when it became evident the letter, addressed to an employee of Bank Hapoalim, was harmless, CNN said. The letter was sent to the Bank Hapoalim branch in midtown Manhattan, CNN reported Wednesday. Bank Hapoalim is on the 11th floor. Floors nine through 14 were reportedly evacuated. The letter, in a 6-by-9-inch envelope, raised alarms because it contained a battery and wires, it did not have a return address and the name of the addressee was misspelled. The mechanism turned out to be of the kind that powers musical greeting cards, police sources said.

Rabbi Defends Tutu

JOHANNESBURG — South African Chief Rabbi Warren Goldstein has slammed a petition seeking the removal of Desmond Tutu as patron of two Holocaust centers in South Africa. "In deference to Archbishop Tutu's widely recognized leadership role in the struggle against apartheid and to his revered position in South Africa, it would be an act of disrespect to remove him as a patron," Rabbi Goldstein said in a statement, adding that he considered Tutu's criticisms of Israel "unfair." The rabbi is also a patron of the Holocaust Centre. The petition was drawn up in mid-December by three prominent Cape Town Jews to protest what they say are Archbishop Tutu's "antisemitic and anti-Israel statements."

McEwan Gets Prize

JERUSALEM — British author Ian McEwan was chosen to receive the prestigious Jerusalem Prize. The biennial prize, which will be awarded next month in a ceremony on the opening night of the Jerusalem Book Fair, is Israel's highest literary honour for foreign writers. The award is given to an author whose works best exemplify the "freedom of the individual in society." McEwan is the author of Amsterdam, Atonement and On Chesil Beach. Previous Jerusalem Prize winners include Japanese author Haruki Murakami in 2009, as well as Americans Arthur Miller in 2003 and Susan Sontag in 2001.

Lieberman Says He Won't Run Again

HARTFORD — U.S. Senator Joe Lieberman noted his "barrier-breaking" vice-presidential candidacy in announcing his decision not to seek re-election.

Joe Lieberman

Lieberman (I-Conn.) announced his decision Jan. 19 in Hartford in the presence of four of his children and six of his grandchildren.

He noted to applause from his followers that an 11th grandchild is due next month, and then said he couldn't help but recall his four grandparents "and the journey they travelled a century ago."

They found freedom, Lieberman said, but they would never imagine that "their grandson ended up a United States senator and incidentally a barrier-breaking candidate for vice president of the United States."

Lieberman, 68, became the first Jewish nominee on a major presidential ticket when Al Gore chose him as his running mate in 2000. He lost favour with Democrats over his support for the Iraq war. He lost the Connecticut primary in 2006, but ran as an independent and won.

He caucused with the Democrats, but backed the presidential campaign of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) in 2008.

Israeli leaders from abroad gather in Toronto

Yuli Edelstein [Yosef Tastassa]

By YOSEF TASTASSA
Special to The CJN

For the first time ever, leaders of Israeli communities around the world met last week to discuss the unique role of an Israeli community in the Diaspora.

"This is a historic moment, and it is very important to be here. Israel needs help from the Israelis abroad," said Amir Gissin, the Israeli consul general in Toronto, at the opening of the three-day conference of the World Council of Israelis Abroad, Building Bridges to World Jewry and the State of Israel, held in Toronto at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and the Lipa Green Building.

The purpose was to "build new relationships with Israelis in the Diaspora by creating the infrastructure to share knowledge, establish connections and build avenues of co-operation," according to promotional materials from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, one of the conference organizers.

Conference heralds new approach by Jerusalem

Under three main "pillars"– building an Israeli community abroad, the relationships between the Israeli and Jewish communities and the relationship between the State of Israel and Israelis abroad – speakers discussed the importance to the Jewish state of Israeli communities abroad and defined the key roles of those communities.

"The Jewish and the Israeli communities abroad are the basis of Israel's humane message," said Israeli Minister of Diaspora Affairs Yuli Edelstein at the opening, thus reflecting the central theme addressed by all the speakers – there has been a dramatic change of attitude by the State of Israel toward its citizens abroad.

Israelis abroad are no longer "yordim" who turned their backs on their homeland, but Israelis who decided to live their lives outside Israel and should not feel ashamed or embarrassed at being Israelis in the Diaspora, said Menachem Kohen of Mishelanu: Organization for Israelis Abroad.

Israel wants to keep in touch with all its citizens and sees their strength as a part of Israel's strength, Gissin said. "Israelis are capturing key roles in the Jewish community. Many of the teachers in the Jewish day schools are Israelis. Kachol-Lavan [a school for Hebrew And Israeli studies] is a leading example of how Israel, Israelis and Jews are creating Israeli culture and preserving it," Gissin said.

For king and and empire

From the editor's desk...

Few members of the generation born after the 1970s will be very familiar, if at all, with the chronology, circumstances, details and myriad turns of the harrowing and uplifting events of World War II.

This is a bad thing. For World War II, it is no exaggeration to write, was a watershed in the continuity of western civilization. It was without moral ambiguity. No moral relativists could ever justify the ugly Nazi ideology or its brutal aspiration of world domination. The Nazis and their like-minded, racist genocidalists had to be defeated. It was a war of necessity.

One of the soldiers who was instrumental in helping defeat the Nazis was Bernard Montgomery, "Monty" as he was known to the world.

In the late summer of 1942, Lt.-Gen. Bernard Montgomery was appointed to command Britain's 8th Army, which was then deployed to defeat the German Afrika Korps, led by Field Marshal Erwin Rommel advancing inexorably from the west in northern Africa deep into Egypt.

The Allied armies had halted the German advance at the Battle of El Alamein, west of Alexandria, in mid-July of 1942. This initial success became known as the first Battle of Alamein. The 8th Army's counter-offensive against Rommel in July was unsuccessful. The two opposing sides dug in to regroup, resupply and re-arm.

During the interim, Montgomery took over command of the 8th Army.

The resumed confrontation between the two contending armies – the second Battle of El Alamein – began in late October and lasted nearly two blood-soaked weeks.

Montgomery's forces prevailed.

Historians have considered the victory at Alamein as the turning point in the war on the North African front. The Nazis were stopped. Their plan to take control of the Suez Canal and the oil fields of the Middle East was thwarted, as was their plan to exterminate the Jews of the Middle East.

Montgomery's reputation for personal bravery and astute military capabilities had been established prior to Alamein. But Alamein helped it soar. He was a hero to his people and an exemplary loyalist to king and empire.

Some four years after the battles at Alamein, in June 1946, a year after the war had ended, Winston Churchill having been thrown from office, Montgomery was appointed chief of the Imperial General Staff.

Britain was struggling to maintain its former lofty, strategic hold in a vastly different postwar world where Downing Street and Whitehall had to cope with severe unemployment and rationing at home, and resistance to imperial rule abroad.

One of the most volatile places in which local inhabitants were resisting British rule was Mandatory Palestine. The Jews were clamouring for a homeland. The British had not only reneged on their commitment to help establish a Jewish homeland there, but were also preventing the brutalized, pitiable remnant of the Jews of Europe from finding sanctuary in Palestine.

According to British historian David Cesarani, Montgomery "was convinced that Palestine had to remain under British control and that whatever solution was found to conflicting Jewish and Arab aspirations, it could not be one that alienated the Arab world. Britain had to reimpose its authority on Palestine, and one way or another, compel the Jews to accept the kind of settlement that would not upset the Arabs." (Of course, such a settlement effectively meant no sovereign national home for the Jewish People, ever.)

In 1946, the Haganah, (the home army under the broad command of the Jewish Agency), the Irgun (the fighters led by Menachem Begin) and Lehi (a more radical group of fighters known as the Stern Gang) had decided to oppose the increasingly brutal methods of the British overlords. The Irgun and Lehi used decidedly more violent means than did the Haganah.

Montgomery, the war hero, determined to crush the Jewish resistance. The following is excerpted from the directive he issued to British forces in Palestine: "strike hard with great speed and determination, with the object of completely and utterly defeating the Jews as soon as possible. You will ensure that every officer and man... realizes to the full the fanatical and cunning nature of his enemy, the unEnglish methods that this enemy will use. All ranks had to realize now that the Jews have flung the gauntlet in our face, they must be utterly and completely defeated and their illegal organizations smashed forever."

Montgomery's directive is reproduced in a remarkable book by David Cesarani called Major Farran's Hat: Murder, Scandal and Britain's War Against Jewish Terrorism 1945-1948.

In next week's column, I will write about Cesarani's book.

Open Window closes doors

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The venerable Toronto baked goods chain Open Window Bakery ceased operations last week after 54 years in business.

Some 150 employees were affected by the shut-down.

The store, started by Holocaust survivor Max Feig in 1957, was renowned for its hand-baked pastries, buns, breads and treats. Feig's daughter, Gail Agasi, was still running the company as its CEO when the doors closed on Jan. 17.

It was one of the city's oldest family-run bakeries.

Tali Watkin-Smith, Feig's granddaughter and a former employee, was on hand last week to help close the store and told The CJN in a phone interview that her family was trying desperately to save the jobs of those affected.

A distraught Watkin-Smith said her mother – Ms. Agasi – and a skeleton sales staff were fielding numerous calls from potential buyers to try to find a financial white knight to keep the chain afloat, but she said she didn't believe there was "any chance" the store would remain in the family's hands.

"Until you're walking in the shoes of someone going bankrupt, you don't know how it feels. The company is insolvent right now... we are trying our best to take care of everyone. If we can sell [the chain], we will, to save our employees' jobs," Watkin-Smith said, adding that many of them have been with the company for 30-plus years.

Confused customers stand outside a locked Open Window-owned outlet at Sheppard Plaza on Jan. 21. The store hadn't posted a sign alerting customers to the chain's bankruptcy, and food could still be seen on shelves inside.

One employee was even hired by Feig in the store's opening year in 1957, she said.

In a Jan. 20, interview with The Toronto Star, Agasi said her company's downfall began in 2008 during the economic recession.

"The world turned upside down, you could say, in 2008. As consumers started watching their pennies, they weren't choosing our products. It's because we don't compromise on quality. A lot of this stuff is still made by hand," she told the Star.

As of last week, the company's website was still up and running and featured a blurb on its current economic strategy, which included partnering with "leading food distributors" such as Gordon Food Service, Summit Foods, Cara, Bruce Edmeades, Traynors, Tannis and others in order to "meet the growing demand" for its products.

The company owned seven stores around the GTA at the time of closure, including its main bakery and headquarters at 1125 Finch Ave. W.

The company owed "more than several hundreds of thousands of dollars" to creditors, according to Agasi.

Watkin-Smith said Feig, 89, now suffers from Alzheimer's and is unaware of what has transpired with the company he founded.

"He survived Buchenwald, came to Canada, was honoured by the province as a survivor and started this store. My zaide was the biggest believer in giving back to the community and to his workers," she said.

"There are countless stories from employees who have been helped by him."

As of The CJN's deadline, negotiations with bidders for the chain were ongoing.

Condo seeks mezuzot ban

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For 2-1/2 years, Jessica Weiser has had a mezuzah affixed to the door frame of her Scollard Street condominium, but a couple of weeks ago, she was told by the building's property manager to remove it.

Weiser was surprised at the request, which she believes violates her freedom of religion. She declined to remove the religious artifact and contacted B'nai Brith Canada for advice.

"This is a human rights issue," she said.

Weiser believes the incident was prompted after a new resident moved in and placed a hat on their door. That likely drew the property manager's attention to the hat and the nearby mezuzah.

She received a call from Caber Management Services asking her "to remove the object," she said. She was told that according to the Condominium Act, residents are not permitted to make any changes to the building's common areas.

Although her interaction with the property managers has been civil, she's upset they would ask her to do something that restricted her religious faith. "I'm not going to remove the mezuzah," she said.

Contacted at her Mississauga office, Caber spokesperson Leza Blair said, "I can't discuss anything of this nature with you."

However, it appears Weiser is far from the first condo resident to face rules that restrict their ability to place a mezuzah on their doorposts.

In July 2008, a U.S. court of appeal in Chicago ruled 2-1 against the right of Jews to place mezuzot on condominium doorposts. "The hallway rule," which prohibits signs and objects on outside doors, "is neutral with respect to religion," the court stated. "We cannot create an accommodation requirement for religion."

The dissenting judge, however, said applying such a rule to mezuzot would in effect amount to evicting observant Jews. "The [condominium] association might as well hand a sign outside saying, 'No observant Jews allowed,'" she stated.

According to Toronto-area lawyer Bradley Chaplick, there have been no reported cases in Ontario over placement of mezuzot in condominiums.

In an article on the Fine & Deo law firm website, Chaplick writes that "many condominium corporations' rules prohibit any object from being affixed to the common elements, including doors and doorposts, without the prior written consent of the board of directors... As well, section 98 of the Condominium Act prohibits unit owners from making changes to the common elements unless certain conditions are met."

Chaplick believes that the "Human Rights Code of Ontario guarantees equal treatment with respect to housing, and prohibits discrimination on the basis of religion. Where the Condominium Act and the Code conflict, the Code prevails.

"If a condominium resident's religious observance requires that they live in a home in which a mezuzah is fixed to the doorpost, it could be discriminatory to that resident if he or she were required to remove it. The provisions of the Code would prevail over the apparent requirement in the Condominium Act that the mezuzah be removed," he stated.

Chaplick recommends owners either seek consent of the board before placing a mezuzah or request permission retroactively.

Exonerated

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan immediately dismissed out of hand the findings of the Turkel commission of inquiry. He told reporters in Ankara merely moments after the report had been delivered in Jerusalem that the Israelis' report into the confrontation last May 31 between Israeli naval commandos and the Gaza blockade-busting "activists" on the Turkish Mavi Marmara, had "no value or credibility."

The Turkish government, it must be remembered, has already delivered its own findings into the violence during which nine of its nationals were killed. Both the Israeli blockade of Gaza and the military operation of May 31 were illegal, the Turkish report found.

Israel's panel of inquiry comprised four distinguished members, headed by former Supreme Court judge Jacob Turkel as well as two foreign observers: Northern Irish former first minister and Nobel Peace Prize winner William David Trimble and retired Canadian military judge Brig.-Gen. Ken Watkin.

The report, released Sunday, is the first part of a two-part inquiry. The second part, to be released some months from now, will offer general suggestions for investigating suspected violations of international law and the decision-making process of the government of Israel in advance of the raid.

The panelists concluded: "The naval blockade imposed on the Gaza Strip – in view of the security circumstances and Israel's efforts to comply with its humanitarian obligations – was legal pursuant to the rules of international law. The actions carried out by Israel on May 31, 2010, to enforce the naval blockade had the regrettable consequences of the loss of human life and physical injuries. Nonetheless, and despite the limited number of uses of force for which we could not reach a conclusion (six out of 133 cases), the actions taken were found to be legal pursuant to the rules of international law."

The commissioners also expressed concern for the medical needs of the people of Gaza and urged Israel to devise a way to "focus its sanctions on Hamas while avoiding harm against the civilian population."

None of the Turkish or British individuals involved in the events of the awful night of May 31 who were invited to testify before the Turkel Commission accepted the invitation.

With reports from Turkey and Israel in hand, a separate UN panel of investigators, chaired by former New Zealand prime minister Geoffrey Palmer, will soon offer its own conclusions on the very same events. Irrespective of the opinion of the Iranian-Syrian-Hezbollah confederate Erdogan, the findings of the Turkel Commission will not be set aside.

On May 31, 2010, Israel sent its soldiers in accordance with the law, and they acted in self-defence. They are exonerated.

Comments misrepresented

My comments were misrepresented in the article "Ukrainian groups oppose museum's Holocaust exhibit" (Jan. 20). I did not say that Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber described me as a "one-man wrecking crew" of Jewish and Ukrainian relations in Canada – that ad hominem insult was penned by Eric Vernon, a CJC employee, who included it in his Dec. 22 response to my article on the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, both published in another newspaper. Needless to say, I found Vernon's remark offensive, even as I lament the lack of civility in what is a legitimate public debate over the proposed contents of this taxpayer-funded national museum.

And for the record, let's be clear: there are 12 galleries (called zones) in the museum. One "Mass Atrocities" gallery will include an exhibit on the Holodomor (the famine brought about by Stalinist policies in the early 1930s that has been blamed for the deaths of millions of Ukrainians), along with – depending on whom you believe – between 49 and 99 other displays lumping together, for example, the "killing fields" of Cambodia with the Armenian genocide and Maoist crimes against humanity.

Only two communities get entire galleries to themselves – one depicting injustices experienced by aboriginal Canadians and the other the horrors of the Shoah. Assigning them permanent, prominent and privileged space elevates their suffering above all others. That is something the Ukrainian Canadian community, and others, are protesting. Our proposed remedy is to make all 12 galleries thematic, comparative and inclusive, which would have true pedagogical value and obviously would include the Holocaust.

Exploiting Jewish heritage for laughs

Though I am not particularly observant, I take offence to the promotion of Epic Meal Time in your newspaper ("YouTube videos let viewers enjoy junk food vicariously," Heebonics, Jan. 20). It is hardly in keeping with The CJN's longstanding journalistic standards. It's not that Harley Morenstein and his gang showcase the most hideous food combinations – all of which fly in the face of Jewish dietary laws. It's that while serving a whole stuffed pig, laden with butter and bacon, someone watching wears a prayer shawl and kippah. I am well aware that many Jewish comedians exploit and degrade their heritage for easy laughs. However, I do not expect your newspaper to congratulate them for it.

Toronto's first Jewish doctor

In "Poet writes loving paeans to Bathurst Manor" (Jan. 6), it is stated that Arthur Parker was the city's first Jewish doctor. We have researched our great-uncle, Sam Lavine, and indeed he was likely the first Jew trained in medicine in Toronto. He graduated from Trinity College in 1899, and shortly thereafter, Trinity amalgamated with several other colleges to form the University of Toronto. Our great-uncle was registered for practice in 1900 in Ontario. His first practice address was registered as 100 John St.

FSWC was first

When e-mails condemning the rumoured boycott of Ahava products began circulating recently within the Jewish community, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) advised our membership that we were conducting an investigation into the matter and would report as soon as we uncovered the truth ("HBC stands firm against Israeli boycott calls," Jan. 20). FSWC ultimately determined there was no boycott by the Bay. This was confirmed by Ahava in Israel and New York, and by the company's president and CEO, Bonnie Brooks.

FSWC was the first organization to issue a community advisory stating there was no boycott. Other organizations' advisories quickly followed. It is therefore surprising that the CJN article unfairly implied that FSWC was in part responsible for the unwarranted rage against the Bay, particularly as we follow a strict set of fact-checking protocols before issuing action alerts to our members.

The Tunisian example for Arab regimes

By SHLOMO BROM
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The downfall of the regime in Tunisia is an unprecedented event in the Arab world. Although that world, which is characterized by autocratic regimes, has in its short history experienced many military coups that brought down a ruler and installed a new strongman, this is the first time that one has fallen as a result of a popular uprising.

The revolution in Tunisia, like the demonstrations in Iran over a year ago, reflects the loss of the Arab regimes' monopoly over the mass media, due primarily to the rise of the Internet. Such a situation makes it difficult for the regimes to maintain control.

The Tunisian upheaval is causing excitement among various groups in the Arab world, where the masses are usually alienated from those who rule them. Some of these countries have already witnessed demonstrations in support of the changes in Tunisia, during which people have also voiced criticism of their own rulers.

The downfall of President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali differs from previously predicted scenarios for the fall of Arab regimes due to popular uprisings. Islamist-led revolts were what was generally discussed, in light of the strengthening of such movements in recent years.

Tunisia is exceptional because it underwent a swift process of modernization and economic development under Ben Ali, and because the infrastructure of the local Islamic movement was eradicated for the most part by his administration. The revolution there has been fomented by a social class with a western education, on which the regime relied in its battle against the Islamic movements. In other Arab countries, the democratic opposition does not have much influence on attitudes on the street, and the main opposition is Islamist.

Former President of Tunisia Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali.

It is hard to predict the results of the next elections in Tunisia, both presidential and parliamentary, after such a long period of autocracy, during which the public was prevented from expressing its true tendencies.

Meanwhile, the leader of the exiled Islamic movement has declared that his organization would not run a presidential candidate of its own in the elections, apparently because it is aware of the difficulty of building a political infrastructure for elections in a short time. But a parliamentary election could still reveal Islamic tendencies that were concealed during the tenure of the previous leaders.

The possible reactions in the Arab world to the Tunisian revolution must be examined in terms of two time periods. In the short term, the demonstrations and the expressions of protest in some Arab countries could gain momentum and create a situation in which their leaders will find it difficult to rein them in. However, the regimes in most Arab countries apparently have a great deal of experience in controlling situations of mass belligerence and will likely manage to restore calm in a relatively short time.

Long-term developments will not be divorced from the unfolding of events in Tunisia. If the elections there take place in an organized manner and end in the formation of a western-oriented government that succeeds in instituting a truly democratic regime, this could be a model for imitation, which could wield an influence over other Arab societies and help improve the status of their democratic opposition elements. On the other hand, post-election scenarios of chaos and of the rise of the Islamic movement to power, by democratic means, would greatly encourage the growing Islamist wave in the Arab world.

The model of a revolution brought about by a popular uprising will likely be studied by the various opposition movements that aspire to imitate it in other Arab countries. But one must take into account the fact that there are differences among the populations in those countries. A great deal also depends on the extent of a given regime's determination to preserve itself, and its ability to build up security mechanisms and population groups with an interest in preserving the leadership.

Anyone who is considering starting a popular uprising will thus have two examples to consider: the successful model, at least in the short term, of Tunisia, and the failure of the mass demonstrations in Iran in 2009, which were firmly suppressed by the Iranian Islamic regime.

Israel should be concerned mainly by developments taking place closer to home – in Egypt and Jordan. Egypt has been immersed for quite some time in the political twilight of its regime, due to the failing health of President Hosni Mubarak and the uncertainty regarding his successor. In Jordan, too, which is experiencing an ongoing economic crisis, there is considerable ferment. The two regimes look stable in the short run, but there is room for concern regarding what can be expected over time.

Shlomo Brom is the head of the program on Israeli-Palestinian relations at the Institute for National Security Studies.

WASHINGTON — The violence roiling Tunisia hasn't put the country's 1,500 or so Jews in serious jeopardy, but Jewish organizations are increasingly concerned about their fate as massive anti-government protests continue.

No Jews have been targeted by the protesters, according to Roger Bismuth, a Jewish businessman and member of Tunisia's Chamber of Deputies.

President Zine al-Abidine Ben Ali, who had ruled Tunisia with an iron fist for 23 years, fled to Saudi Arabia following violent protests by mostly unemployed young men venting their anger at Ben Ali and his wealthy cronies.

Last week, the North African country's interim prime minister and president, Mohamed Ghannouchi and Fouad Mebazaa, both resigned from what had been the country's ruling party.

"The community is fine," Bismuth told JTA by phone from Tunis. "Up until now we've had no problems. This is not really a matter of religion – it's a popular revolution. The Jewish community is very well taken care of."

Asked about Ben Ali, often described by the local Jewish community as a protector of Tunisia's Jews, Bismuth sounded a new tone.

"He was behaving like a crook," Bismuth said. "He and his family stole property from people and the state, and they destroyed everything they could put their hands on."

Natan Sharansky, the chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, described the Tunisian government of Ben Ali as a "corrupt and kleptocratic dictatorship."

About 1,000 Jews, the majority of Tunisia's Jewish community, live on the island of Djerba, where Jews have maintained a historical presence for more than 2,000 years. Another 400 Jews live in Tunis, the capital, with much smaller communities in Zarzis, Sfax and Sousse.

The country's population of 9.5 million is nearly all Muslims. Islam is the state religion of Tunisia, which sits on the Mediterranean coast between Algeria and Libya just south of Italy.

In 2002, a terrorist attack on the El-Ghriba synagogue in Djerba involving a truck bomb killed 21 tourists, mostly Germans. Al Qaeda took responsibility for the bombing.

Judy Amit, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's (JDC) regional director for Africa and Asia, said her organization has been in daily contact with Tunisian Jewish leaders throughout the crisis.

"Ever since the rioting erupted there, we've been in close contact with members of the community," said Amit, speaking in an interview from Israel. "It's an economic protest with local grievances related to high unemployment and high food prices. There's been no violence against the Jewish community, and no Jews or Jewish institutions have been targeted."

Jason Isaacson, director of government and international affairs at the American Jewish Committee, said that "Jews have been part of the fabric of Tunisian life for more than 2,000 years, since well before the Arab conquest."

Yet Isaacson, who visited Tunisia last month, warned that things could quickly change for the worse.

"My concern is that if the situation is not stabilized, there could be further instability and create a breeding ground for extremism," he said. "That's not been a part of the equation, but it could happen if the enormous damage done first by Ben Ali and second by the riots is not compensated by a very serious international infusion of outside assistance."

As of earlier this week, some 78 people had been killed, with economic losses estimated at $2.2 billion – equivalent to about four per cent of Tunisia's gross domestic product. Schools and universities have been shut down as a precaution against violence and vandalism by protesters, including the Chabad school in downtown Tunis.

Yechiel Bar-Chaim, JDC's country director for Tunisia, said his main concern is for the 100 Jews of Zarzis, who live in a two-square-block area just off the town centre. Four non-Jewish civilians were killed during protests there, and a Jewish shop was among the many looted.

Bar-Chaim said that until a few days ago, this self-imposed "ghetto without walls" was carefully guarded by police. But the police have "simply disappeared from the streets of Zarzis and the army presence there is basically a passive one," he reported.

"The police have reportedly disappeared in many places throughout Tunisia," though a heavy police presence continues to guard the Grand Synagogue of Tunis and the central building of the Jewish community, he said.

Isaacson, who has been speaking by phone daily to Bismuth and other Tunisian Jewish leaders since the crisis began, said that "it's generally a secular uprising directed at the regime's corruption and economic stagnation and a general desire for freedom, especially in the last few days as unrest has continued."

What the vandals could learn from their targets

On a cold Montreal night in mid-January, criminals vandalized five synagogues and a school. Canadian leaders from left to right denounced the crime, proving that North American antisemitism today is unlike the antisemitism of Europe then or too many Arab countries now. Antisemitism in Canada – and the rest of the civilized world – is a crime committed by marginal misfits, not an extension of state policy or local politics. As of this writing, the criminals remain at large, but we can nevertheless learn some important lessons from these outrages.

Gill Troy

Jews should learn once again the essential lesson of Jewish unity. The criminals struck Ashkenazi and Sephardi institutions, three Orthodox synagogues, one Conservative and one Reconstructionist shul. These hoodlums target Jews, regardless of ethnic or denominational difference. We should reaffirm our mutual respect for one another. We may pray differently or believe a bit differently. We may look or sound a little different. But we are one.

That unity, of course, shouldn't simply be because we all look the same in the antisemite's crosshairs, but because we share a rich tradition, many similar values and a common fate. Traumas such as these are never welcome. But we should exploit them as opportunities to reaffirm our common sense of peoplehood, maintaining the Jewish tradition of making poetry out of our enemies' perversity.

If these hoodlums are caught, I hope that – after they (or their parents) pay not just for the damage but to improve each institution somehow – they are forced to learn about their six targets. Simply learning about the six names alone would expose them to the richness of Jewish tradition and history.

Let them start with Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem to learn about King David and the Holy City of Jerusalem. Let them learn David's psalms, which show how glorifying God elevates humanity. And let them learn how even King David was not above the law, enduring God's punishment when he sinned by pursuing the married Batsheva. Let them learn about the Temple's grandeur in Jerusalem 3,000 years ago, a time when few humans had seen such a large structure, let alone built one.

Moving on to Yavne Academy, I would teach about Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai, who in 68 CE established Yavne as a centre of Jewish learning outside Jerusalem so Jewish scholarship and civilization could continue – and keep us thriving – after Jerusalem's destruction two years later. I would teach why we use the term "CE" (common era) rather than AD (anno domini) to organize the western calendar. We acknowledge Jesus as an epoch-making historical character without characterizing him as our lord – or the lord of many others who don't believe in him.

Congrégation Sépharade Beth Rambam would provide an opportunity to introduce Rabbi Moses ben-Maimon, Maimonides, the extraordinary rabbi, doctor and philosopher who lived from 1135 to 1204. Maimonides' life symbolizes the rich mix of western, Muslim, and Jewish cultures that flourished in medieval Spain, and flourishes now. Learning about Maimonides reveals the creative tensions between rationalism and faith, between secular learning and religious studies, with the message that we don't have to make false choices between two good things. Life involves balancing, synthesizing and learning from difference.

I would continue the history lesson – with its life lessons – with Beth Zion Congregation, teaching how Zion, the mountain in Jerusalem, became a focus of longing and unity through nearly 2,000 years of exile. Learning of Zion flows naturally into learning about Zionism, about the remarkable return to the Jewish homeland and the unfortunate hatred this extraordinary Jewish and human enterprise endures.

Finally, I would end with Congregation Dorshei Emet, the Truth Seekers, and Shaarei Zedek Congregation, the Gates of Justice, teaching about the eternal Jewish – and human – quest for understanding and righteousness. Note that Judaism judges people by their good acts, their mitzvot, not their beliefs – by what they do not what they think.

I would end with another creative clash defining Judaism today, between modernity and tradition – and how that yielded Conservatism and Reconstructionism, as well as Orthodoxy, because Orthodoxy itself is a modern concept forged in rebellion against the Reformers of the 1800s.

Wouldn't it be great if all antisemites learned about the richness of Jewish civilization from these synagogues and other sources? Then again, wouldn't it be great if every modern Jew could not only take this kind of course, but teach it?

Tikkun olam in the jungle

I frequently hear people say, "I'm a good person, which makes me a good Jew." I used to think that statement was used to avoid having to do much ritual, and to give "mitzvah credit" to things like being kind to animals and walking old ladies across the street. I've preached against "Boy Scout Judaism," which equates doing good deeds with doing Jewish things.

But today, I feel differently. If only more Jews took the notion of good deeds as Jewish deeds seriously! Our Christian neighbours have the concept of "witness." They believe they must exemplify Christian values in everything they do, not just in church. Every good deed is a "Christian" deed and shows the world the "Christian way." I wish more Jews knew that Judaism espouses the notion of "Jewish values" in everything we do, from the way we speak to a bank teller to the way we drive on the highway.

We're required to act in a moral way toward every human being, not just Jews, "mipnei darchei shalom" – to bring about peace. Rambam suggests that "darchei shalom" requires us to act in a neighbourly manner not so that good feeling will result. "Mipnei darchei shalom" requires that we show the world the inner message of Torah, that we be a light unto the nations outside of our little shul boxes.

That's where tikkun olam comes in. First used in the 1950s to refer to social action work, it's now used by many groups to refer to social action programs and progressive Jewish approaches to social issues. It was originally associated with Kabbalah and the notion of repairing the broken vessels of God's creation by doing mitzvot. The phrase "tikkun olam" remains connected to human responsibility for fixing what's wrong with the world.

The whole world, not just the Jewish one. In Pirkei Avot, Hillel asks: "If I am not for me, who will be for me? But when I am only for myself, what am I?"

I grew up in New York in the turbulent 1960s, but whatever else we did, one thing was clear: Jews got involved in the world. Our Jewish youth groups marched against the Vietnam War. My mother took a bus-load of people from our synagogue to Washington, D.C., to march for reproductive rights. There was no bifurcation between being religious and being socially active in causes that "weren't Jewish." Vietnam was a Jewish issue. Integration was a Jewish issue.

What made us so much more insular? How many times have I been told that child poverty, tax reform and illiteracy aren't "Jewish issues"? I'm not gay, so gay rights isn't my issue? I'm not black or Asian, so minority rights isn't my issue? I'm Jewish, so only Jewish issues are my issues?

I want to be the kind of Jew who balances the beauty of tradition with the prophetic call for justice.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, in his book Healing the World, writes, "In Judaism, faith is not acceptance, but protest, against the world that is, in the name of the world that is not yet but ought to be... There are cultures that relieve humankind of responsibility, lifting us beyond the world of pain to bliss... they teach us to accept the world as it is and us as we are. They bring peace of mind, and that is no small thing. Judaism is not peace of mind... I remain in awe at the challenge God has set us: to change, to 'mend' the world until it becomes a place worthy of the divine presence, because we have learned to honour the image of God that is humankind."

That's why I am leading a "voluntour" to Guatemala this April. I'm looking for a few more people who believe faith is protest. People who believe that building a school in a rural village is a Jewish thing to do. That meeting indigenous Jews who are brown-skinned is a Jewish thing to do. That spending Shabbat in the jungle and making a shul under the trees is a Jewish thing to do. Who don't ask, "Why would a rabbi care about a village in Guatemala?" Contact me at rabbi@prossermanjcc.com if you'd like to know more. The world is waiting to be shown the message of Torah from a few more Jewish "witnesses."

Barak leaves the Labor party in ruins

Ehud Barak's sudden resignation from the social democratic Labor party and his calculated decision to remain in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's rightist government as defence minister was the culmination of a long and bitter process that may well lead to the party's demise.

In breaking away from the Labor party – whose leadership he recaptured in 2007 after a bruising battle with incumbent Amir Peretz – and forming a centrist Knesset faction, Atzmaut (Independence), Barak single-handedly diminished its chances of surviving as a viable party.

With four other Labor party dissidents – Matan Vilnai, Shalom Simhon, Einat Wilf and Ori Noked – joining Barak, the party's representation in parliament was reduced to a pathetic rump. From 13 seats after the 2009 election, the party now holds only eight seats in the Knesset.

How the mighty have fallen.

From 1949 to 1977, with leaders such as David Ben-Gurion, Levi Eshkol and Golda Meir at the helm, the party was a formidable force, building and securing the new state. The Likud, a right-wing Zionist coalition headed by Menachem Begin, broke Labor's monopoly in 1977, coasting to victory on the strength of corruption scandals in the Labor party and a nation-wide drift to the right. Likud and Labor shared power during much of the 1980s, but Labor triumphed in 1992, winning 44 seats as Yitzhak Rabin regained his old job. After his assassination in 1995, the party's electoral fortunes plummeted.

With Shimon Peres in charge, Labor won 10 less seats in 1996. Under Barak's stewardship, the party, while ousting the Likud in the 1999 election, managed to win only 26 seats. With Amram Mitzna leading it, the party scraped by with 19 seats in the 2003 election. Mitzna resigned and was succeeded by Peres, who in turn was replaced by Peretz. In the 2006 election, he held on to Labor's 19 seats.

Peretz's undistinguished performance as defence minister in the 2006 war in Lebanon cost him dearly. Barak, the former prime minister and chief of staff of the armed forces, supplanted Peretz in 2007 after having left politics following his defeat to Ariel Sharon in the 2001 election.

For the next few years, Barak focused his energies on business ventures in Israel and the United States. He returned to politics in 2005, making an abortive attempt to supplant Peres as leader.

Labor, in the meantime, had joined Ehud Olmert's government as a junior partner. Olmert, the leader of the new Kadima party, became prime minister after Sharon suffered a massive stroke and lapsed into a coma. Olmert chose Barak as his defence minister.

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

When Olmert stepped down, his place was taken by Tzipi Livni. Although winning the greatest number of seats in the 2009 election, she was unable to cobble together a government, leaving the field to Netanyahu. Livni declined to join Netanyahu's government, refusing to be a "fig leaf" for his policies. Barak, however, had no such compunctions. Eager to be defence minister again, he forced the Labor party to join the Likud, claiming he would shift Netanyahu's thinking and cajole him into peacemaking with the Palestinians.

Barak's opponents in the Labor party continued to believe that Netanyahu, notwithstanding his belated pronouncement favouring a two-state solution, had no interest in reaching an equitable accommodation with the Palestinian Authority.

For a while, Barak was something of a moderating force. He convinced Netanyahu to agree to a partial settlement freeze in the West Bank. He urged him not to squander opportunities to forge peace with the Palestinians. He said that Israel would have to make "some difficult decisions" to advance the prospects of peace. Amid U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit to Israel last year, Barak concurred with the widespread condemnation of the government's announcement to build 1,600 housing units in eastern Jerusalem.

According to reports, Barak assured the United States, Israel's ally, that Netanyahu would sincerely pursue a peace agreement with the Palestinian Authority, led by Mahmoud Abbas. But when Netanyahu did not extend the partial nine-month settlement moratorium, so as to preserve his coalition government, Washington expressed disappointment.

The Obama administration let it be known that Barak had "deceived" the United States, which had vigorously pushed for an extension in the interests of reviving talks, which commenced and collapsed within a three-week period last September.

Barak's critics in the Labor party, as well as Livni, voiced support for an extension. And while Barak may have been sympathetic, he did not say so publicly. Barak's deafening silence, along with his abrasive leadership style, his flaunting of wealth (he bought a multi-million dollar flat in Tel Aviv) and his messy divorce, did nothing to endear him to some party members.

As grumbling escalated, Daniel Ben-Simon, the Labor faction chief, resigned, saying that Barak was unfit to lead a left-of-centre party. As 2011 dawned, Ben-Simon left the party altogether. Labor MK Ophir Pines-Paz, a former cabinet minister, bolted, too, asserting that the party had lost its way and that Netanyahu's sole goal was to maintain the status quo.

Two other rebels, Welfare and Social Services Minister Isaac Herzog and Minorities Affairs Minister Avishay Braverman, warned the Labor party would leave the government unless peace talks, suspended by the Palestinians after Netanyahu failed to renew the partial settlement freeze, resumed by the end of 2010.

It was not an idle threat. In 2003, the Labor party pulled out of Sharon's Likud government after it was claimed that Sharon was not promoting peace.

Ehud Barak

All along, Barak said he would remain in the government until the end of its term. This comment prompted Ha'aretz columnist Yoel Marcus to observe that Barak was lending legitimacy to the diplomatic impasse and was "focused" on maintaining his personal position at all costs. An editorial writer in the same newspaper was just as scathing: "A respectable politician would have joined the opposition, but Barak joined Netanyahu and [Foreign Minister Avigdor] Lieberman in exchange for the defence portfolio."

After bolting the Labor party, Barak said he had placed the interests of Israel first, noting that Atzmaut's top priority would be the state, "then the party, and only at the end, us." Ripping into his detractors, Barak said that a complex peace process could not be monitored with a stopwatch.

As the dust settles, Barak's former colleagues are glad he is gone. "The Labor party, which founded the State of Israel, got rid of a hump on its back," declared Herzog, the son of a former Israeli president.

But now that Barak has bolted – as did Peres, Ben-Gurion and Moshe Dayan in the past – the Labor party has the daunting task of rebuilding itself from the ruins.

Indian Jews fascinate educator

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As a historian, Dr. Kranti Farias is concerned about origins and heritage, including her own.

When her son was born, people did a double take about her light-skinned progeny, who looked so different from his dark-skinned mother, she said. That's when she learned from a relative that her family might have Portuguese blood in its lineage, dating back to the European colonization of parts of India, her homeland.

What's more, she continued, there were Conversos (forcibly converted Jews) who were among the Portuguese traders, suggesting she might also have Jewish roots in her past. That might explain her fascination with Jews, particularly the tiny Jewish communities of India.

Indian Jewish children

Farias, who is visiting her daughter in Toronto, spoke earlier this month at Congregation Darchei Noam about a subject she has embraced in recent years – the Jews of India.

Around five years ago, she began to look into the Jewish traditions behind her own Christian faith. Her interest was reinforced by a good friend of hers who was a member of the Bene Israel, India's acknowledged Jewish community, who subsequently moved to Israel.

"I made quite a deep study of Indian Jews," focusing on the nexus between Judaism and Christianity and on the Hindu influences on Jewish life, she explained. Although there are now only about 4,000 to 5,000 Bene Israel remaining in India, mostly in Mumbai, Delhi and Amadab, some have risen to prominence in Indian society. One, Elijah Moses, even served as mayor of Mumbai, she said.

Schools and synagogues serve the community, whose own traditions trace their presence in India to 70 CE, when seven men and an equal number of women survived a shipwreck. They formed the basis of a community that has persisted for 2,000 years, during which time they lived free of prejudice or discrimination, she said.

Living apart from the wider Jewish world, they first reconnected when a trader from Cochin – whose own tradition traces their roots in India to Solomonic times – arrived in the 12th century and "was informed about a peculiar people who keep holiness of Saturday."

Devising a test, the businessman "placed a basket of fish before them and saw they separated them – scaled versus non-scaled," just as the laws of kashrut mandated. "He thought they were Jews."

At the time, the Jews were known in the local dialect as "the Saturday oil men," because they followed a traditional method of making vegetable oil.

When India turned over Mumbai to the British, Jews moved from nearby Alibag and have resided in the Indian city since, Farias said.

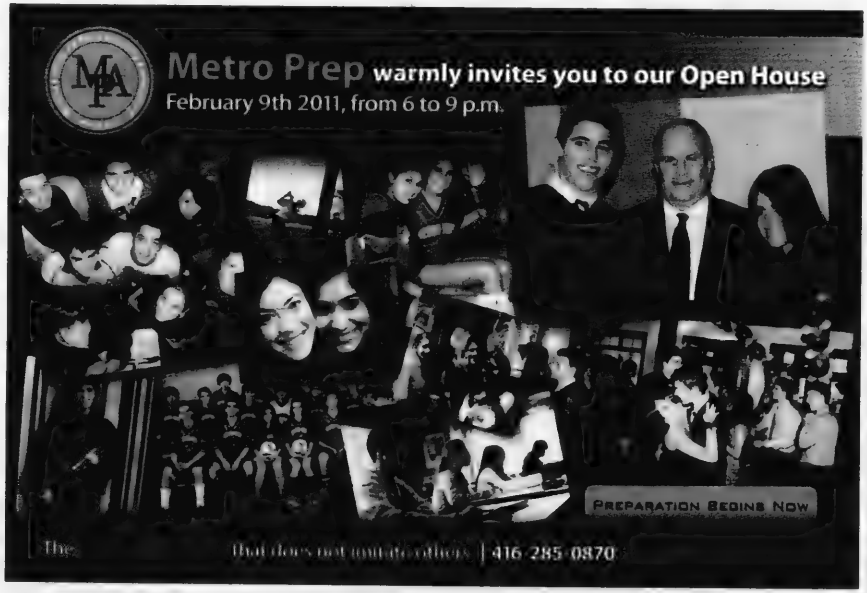
In the 18th century, a group of Baghdadi Jews began moving to the region, the Sassoon family being the most prominent among them. The Sassoons were noted philanthropists, building a city library, a clock that remains a civic landmark, as well as a synagogue.

When the opportunity arose, many Bene Israel made aliyah. "They considered India their motherland, but felt they had to go back to the fatherland," she said. Though their integration was difficult at first – many were not considered Jews by native Israelis – that situation has improved, with many younger Indians marrying Israelis of various backgrounds.

In recent years, another group of long-lost Indians with a claim on Jewish ancestry has emerged, she continued. The Bnei Menashe claim descent from the ancient tribe of Menashe, one of Joseph's sons. Although the tribe had long ago taken up Christianity, they are returning to Judaism. An American, Rabbi Michael Freund, has assisted them in conversion process.

"They live like the Mizo [from the province of Mizoram], with Mongolese features. That leads to more doubt about how such a group became Jewish," she said. "But over time, due to their environment, there were bound to be changes."

Farias has spent about a month with them and feels they are completely sincere. "Deep down, they feel there is a call," she said. "They sing a Mizo song referring to the parting of the waters [Red Sea]. It's a tradition that has come down for generations."



City of Vaughan Mayor Maurizio Bevilacqua looks on as Rabbi Asher Vale hangs a mezuzah at ETA Vaughan's outreach centre.

Kosher kitchen opens at Vaughan women's shelter

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Staff at ETA Vaughan (Empowerment Through Achievement) women's shelter, is determined to address the needs of members of every ethnic group.

With that in mind, the shelter, which can currently house six families, is constructing a kosher kitchen.

As well, mezuzot were recently affixed on the shelter's doors by Rabbi Asher Vale, interim rabbi of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Synagogue.

In order to respect the privacy of families, only the rabbi and staff members were allowed at the shelter, but prior to going there, he affixed mezuzot on the doors of ETA Vaughan's outreach centre in Kleinburg.

The shelter, which provides emergency housing for families escaping from abusive situations, also provides life-skills and job-search training, necessary legal or court support, counselling for women and their children, as well as help in finding future permanent housing.

The outreach centre provides counselling and access to resource tools such as reference material on legal issues, government agencies and programs, and housing. Programs and workshops are available on parenting skills, assertiveness training, anger management, as is the opportunity to network.

Arlene Margolese, chair of the board of ETA Vaughan, said that the City of Vaughan is a "rainbow of nationalities, and we want to be open and available to women of all cultures. We want this to be a place where everyone can feel comfortable. Families should be able to heal in whatever way possible. The women have enough to contend with already. This makes it easier."

Rabbi Vale said he's gratified at ETA Vaughan's sensitivities, and added that in Israel, most women's shelters are not kosher.

Vaughan Mayor Maurizio Bevilacqua, who was at the outreach centre, said it's "heartwarming to see people with a vision fill in a void created by various levels of government.We will try to address important needs in our community."

Antonietta Raviele, in-house counsel and executive administrator, said that at the end of the day, "it doesn't matter what our background is. We're there to provide support."

Emmy winner Mike Reiss to entertain at UJA Campaign Closing

Nice Jewish boy begins his 23rd season as writer of The Simpsons

By Daniel Horowitz

According to Mike Reiss, at another time in our history, he and other comedy writers may have suffered a fate similar to those accused of witchcraft.

For the past 23 years, Reiss, a 51 year old from Bristol, Connecticut, has been a writer and producer of The Simpsons, winning four Emmy Awards and a Peabody Award.

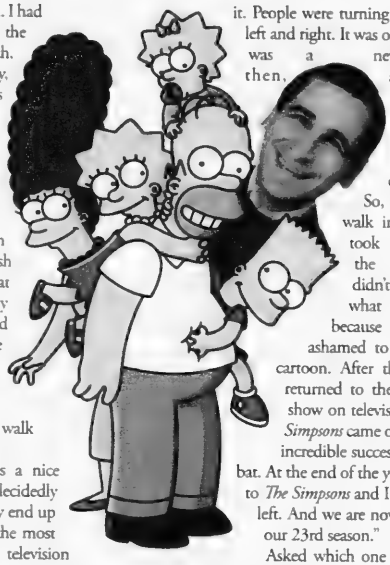
In 2006 Reiss received a lifetime Achievement Award from the Animation Writers Caucus. Reiss also co-created the animated series The Critic and created Showtime's hit cartoon Queer Duck.

Reiss, a talented and entertaining public speaker, will be sharing his thoughts with Toronto's Jewish community at UJA Federation's Campaign Closing celebration on Tuesday, February 15 at The Westin Prince Hotel.

"There's definitely something wrong with us," he says of himself and others who ply their trade as comedy writers, during a recent telephone interview. "It's a nice quirk of history that in this century, there's a high paying job doing what we do. In any other century, all comedy writers may have been rounded up and burnt at the stake, or locked up in a mental hospital."

Growing up Jewish in Bristol, the home of ESPN, to which Mike quickly responds, "before that, it was home to nothing," was not easy for Mike and his family. In fact, he likens the experience to "living in a daily pogrom."

"It was very difficult," he says, turning serious for a moment. "In fact, I was the only Jewish kid in my high school. I had my bar mitzvah in the shul in Bristol which, not coincidentally, was called Mike's Synagogue. I believe the shul closed down after I left Bristol, however. Out of 50,000 families in Bristol, there may have been 50 Jewish ones. I think I'm Jewish by physiognomy; that is, I look so incredibly Jewish. I have, based on my appearance alone, become a spokesman for our faith. People know I'm a Jew the second I walk into the room."



So, just how does a nice Jewish boy from a decidedly un-Jewish community end up writing for arguably the most popular animated television series of all time?

"In 1988, I was writing for the lowest rated television show called This is Gary Shandling's Show," he explains. "During the summer, I had a few months off when I heard that they were trying to do a Simpsons show. Remember, at that point in time, The Simpsons were just one-minute shorts on The Tracey Ullman Show. Nobody wanted to work on it. People were turning down the job left and right. It was on FOX, which was a new network then, and it was an animated show, which nobody thought could work. So, one day, I walk into FOX and took the job for the summer. I didn't tell anybody what I was doing because I was so ashamed to be writing a cartoon. After the summer, I returned to the lowest rated show on television when The Simpsons came out and was an incredible success right off the bat. At the end of the year, I returned to The Simpsons and I literally never left. And we are now working on our 23rd season."

Asked which one of the show's characters he most closely relates to, Reiss is quickly in touch with his feminine side.

"Oh, Lisa, definitely," he says, referring to the saxophone-playing eldest daughter on the show. "Me and all the writers are most like Lisa – we're smart, with absolutely no friends. Actually, we all want to be like Bart, but we're just not popular. When we were younger, we were all like Lisa, then, one day, we all woke up and we had become Homer."

In 2002, The Simpsons travelled north from Springfield to Toronto. Upon disembarking their plane (presumably at Pearson Airport) Marge Simpson exclaimed: "It's so bland!"

So, Mike, would you like to apologize to Torontonians for insulting our beloved city?

"No, it was supposed to be an insult," he says with a laugh. "The Simpsons have visited a different city every year, and we always get in trouble wherever we go. We got yanked off the air in Japan, we got sued by the Brazilian government, and then the Simpsons went to Toronto and we got flooded with complaints the next day. The main complaint we received was, 'you didn't make enough fun of us!' I have no idea why such an enormous country has such a self-esteem problem."

Asked about how he sees the final episode – whenever that may be – of The Simpsons, Reiss admits he has no idea.

"All the writers have been talking about the last episode for 23 years now, and, really, we don't have any great ideas in mind. Maybe we'll just have to wrap it all up neatly and have Mr. Burns die; Smithers will come out of the closet; Maggie will finally talk, and Marge shoots Homer. Actually, I hope we never go off the air, because I have no idea how we'd sign off."

Tickets to the UJA Campaign 2011 closing are going fast. The cost is $30 and includes a dessert reception. To register online, visit ujaevents.com/registration/Simpsons or email mspring@ujafed.org or call 416.631.5685.

Boycott Israel movement receives a strong setback

By Howard English

The Hudson's Bay Company (HBC) has deflated the dreams of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement (BDS) by expressing its unequivocal opposition to political boycotts. The BDS movement seeks to stop the sale of Israeli products, visits by notable Israelis and investments in Israeli companies everywhere in the world. Israel is the only country against which the BDS movement seeks to impose these widespread punitive measures.

In a January 13th statement released by HBC, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canada Israel Committee, the company made it clear that "it has not bowed to political pressure in the past, has not done so now, and will not do so in the future." The statement went on to say that "HBC neither subscribes to nor endorses politically-motivated boycotts of merchandise from countries with which Canada has open and established trading relationships, including Israel."

HBC's anti-boycott declaration followed a concerted campaign by boycott Israel proponents to convince The Bay to permanently discontinue sales of Ahava beauty products for political reasons. Instead, the Bay emphasized that the Ahava line will be unavailable only until the spring when the products will be reformulated and redesigned for a planned relaunch.

Despite the clarity of HBC's statement, boycott advocates tried to portray events surrounding Ahava and the Bay as a victory.

"So although this is not a BDS victory in Canada, it may well be a worldwide BDS victory," said the canpalnet Ottawa web site. "The Ahava image is tainted. The campaign against it has been so successful that the distributor has to re-brand the product just like Israel is seeking to re-brand itself."

Ahava, however, attributes its rebranding effort strictly to the sales objective of expanding its North American markets. "We will be prioritizing North America for growth in 2011 and beyond – it is our largest market outside of Israel and moving forward we aim to push the boundaries and expand further still," said AHAVA's CEO, Yacov Ellis.

"There is no defeat from which the boycott Israel forces will not try to desperately extract a victory," noted Sheldon Goodman, co-chair of UJA Federation's Committee on Public Affairs.

"For Canada's flagship retailer to publicly dismiss the boycott serves as an important benchmark for responsible corporate practice," concluded the chair of CIJA (Canadian Council of Israel and Jewish Advocacy) Steven Cummings. "For those organizations engaged in an obsessive campaign to isolate Israel, it represents a resounding – indeed embarrassing – defeat."

Emmy award-winning actor Eric Braeden, best known for his 31-year role as Victor Newman on the soap opera Young and the Restless, said he spent years trying to build bridges between Germans and Jews, and to repair the damage done to Germany's reputation by the Nazis.

Braeden, who spoke to The CJN from Los Angeles just a day after his visit to Toronto for an appearance on the Marilyn Denis Show, said he was compelled to promote dialogue between Germans, Americans and Jews because of the way Germans were portrayed in the media and film after World War II.

"[I have] enormous anger towards what had been committed in the name of Germany by the f___ing Nazis, an anger at the vilification of Germans in all media, and an insistence on showing simply what that 12-year period [from 1933 to 1945] in German history was like," said Braeden, who was born Hans Gudegast in 1941 near Kiel, Germany.

"And I was at the centre of the town that perpetrated that image."

With a career that has spanned about five decades, Braeden has played memorable roles including John Jacob Astor in the 1997 film Titanic, as well as countless television roles.

Many of the acting gigs he landed early in his career had him playing a Nazi. He said the roles he played on 1960s television shows set during World War II, such as Rat Patrol and Combat, "were all bullshit.

"As an actor you play what you're given, what you're hired for, so that is the one side of it," Braeden said.

"[But] they were caricatures. If the Germans were that stupid, they would have been defeated in half a year."

He said the simplistic portrayal of Germans and Nazis in American film and television "enraged" him because he felt it was a "total distortion of history, and if you want to learn from that period, you don't deal with a caricature Nazi."

He said it is more interesting to examine how easy it is to "seduce most people if the right economic conditions are given and if the right propaganda is given."

Although he was a young child during the war, he has vivid memories of terrifying attacks near his village.

"There were bomb attacks every night and then every day and night. My most visceral memories are of seeing burning buildings, hearing animals screaming because farm houses had been fire-bombed by the Brits. And kids... had been shot at by low flying English pilots," he recalled, adding that he remembers being carried into a bomb shelter in his basement almost every night.

"But I know there is much more to the country I came from than that 12-year period run by those bastards."

In an attempt to educate the western world that there was more to Germany than Nazis and war, Braeden co-founded the German American Cultural Society in 1990. The GACS is a non-profit organization that works to promote German culture and foster German-Jewish dialogue.

"We talk to each other instead of creating caricatured images of each other," Braeden said.

He said that today, he is not as involved as he once was due to time constraints, but he also added that he's not as enthusiastic about it because he feels like the stereotypes are still being promoted in the media and in Hollywood.

When Braeden visited Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust Museum, during a 2004 trip to Israel for the annual tourism conference, he was disappointed with the way some of the exhibits were worded.

When the guides asked him what he thought of the tour, he said, "as a German, you are filled with enormous anger, shame guilt, and everything else."

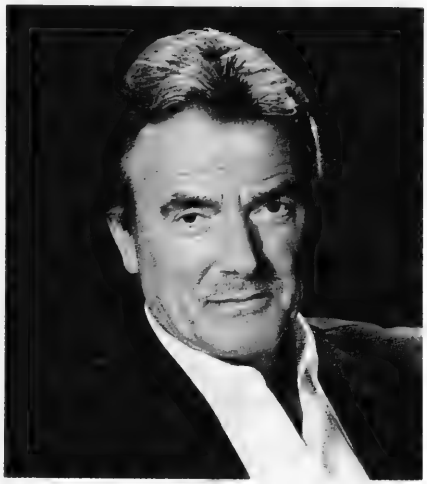
But he said the one thing that upset him was that the exhibits sometimes referred to the perpetrators as Germans rather than Nazis.

"There has to be a differentiation made. You cannot tell all young, Jewish generations that it was the Germans. You have to be specific about it and say the Nazis.

"It's not as if Germany had been a democracy and said, 'OK, now let us kill all the Jews in Europe.' That simply was not that case. And it angers me because it contributes to the stereotyping and that is what I'm so totally against."

He added that it is examples like these that dampen his enthusiasm for promoting dialogue.

"I see that there is no attempt at reciprocity, really. Certainly most of the Jewish media, I think, have contributed to perpetuating that image, so I'm no longer that interested, to be frank with you."



Eric Braeden

Despite his disappointment, Braeden maintains he is still a staunch supporter of Israel.

His connection with Israel goes back about 40 years when he played soccer with the Los Angeles Maccabees in the 1970s, a team that won the US National Soccer Championship in 1973.

"I like Israelis, I have always gotten along well with them," said Braeden. "I feel a kind of closeness with Israel and Israelis."

In 2004, Braeden's connection to Israel was solidified when he received a humanitarian award from the Israeli government, and met with former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon and Israeli President Shimon Peres during the tourism conference.

The following year, Braeden joined Sharon and Noble Peace Prize Laureate Elie Wiesel on the March Of The Living.

He said that he has been an outspoken supporter of Israel because "Israel is the result, in part, of the Holocaust caused by Nazi Germany. It gave the moral imprimatur to the establishment of Israel, and I feel that as a German of my generation or any generation that we have an obligation to support that country."

He said he decided to visit Israel because he was "curious" about it.

"Historically, it is one of the most interesting countries. Jerusalem gives one goose bumps. You become aware of the history of that city... I remember standing at the Wailing Wall and, wow, it was such an extraordinary feeling," he said with a whisper.

As for his work on Young and the Restless, Braeden's contract expires in 2013, but he said it's too soon to know if he will re-sign.

"I have no idea right now... It depends on a few things."

Currently, Braeden's character, Victor Newman, is becoming increasingly estranged from his family.

"When that amount of money is involved, strange things happen, even within families," Braeden said."You know, Victor always gets even, so that is all I can say."

Braeden, who said he loves Canada and Canadians, is planning a visit to Ottawa to sign autographs at the National Women's Show at the Ottawa Convention Centre on April 30, as well as in Toronto at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre on Nov. 30.

Canadian Jews urged to speak on Israeli issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Anat Hoffman has a message for Canadian Jews: Israel is "too important to be left to Israelis. The Jews here have a right and a duty to voice their hopes for Israel."

If they don't, she warned in a Jan. 17 interview, "they may wake up one day and see an Israel they absolutely cannot relate to... Israel is a state of all the Jews, whether they live there or not, and reflects on all Jews."

Hoffman – the 56-year-old executive director of the Israel Religious Action Center (IRAC) in Jerusalem, who was arrested at the Western Wall last summer for carrying a Torah at a women's Rosh Chodesh service – spoke at Temple Anshe Sholom in Hamilton and also had meetings in Toronto during a two-day visit at the beginning of last week.

She was brought here by ARZA Canada: the Zionist Voice of the Canadian Reform Movement, which is IRAC's largest donor.

IRAC, the public and legal advocacy arm of the Reform movement in Israel, has taken on issues such as conversion, marriage, divorce, immigrant rights, gender discrimination, racism and corruption since its inception in 1987.

Hoffman rejects the argument that Jews must live in Israel to have a voice on such issues. "It's very important. We are a young democracy, and if you are a Jew and you live in a democracy, and you can, warn Israel. You're obliged to tell Israel."

Recently Hoffman was among the leaders of negotiations that resulted in an additional six-month moratorium of the Rotem Conversion Bill. IRAC has also initiated a court case demanding that Reform and Conservative conversions done in Israel be recognized.

> Hoffman was arrested for carrying a Torah at Western Wall

Hoffman, a former Jerusalem city councillor, is convinced the overwhelming majority of Jews believe that values such as pluralism, equality, tolerance and social justice should be major values of the State of Israel. "But they are not vocal enough."

In response to a ruling last month by dozens of Israel's municipal chief rabbis that forbids renting or selling property to gentiles, and specifically to Arabs, Hoffman said she'd like Canadian Jews to protest outside the Israeli consulate. "Racism is not the Jewish way," she said.

IRAC has demanded that Israel's attorney general fire those rabbis, she said. "They are barred from incitement in their jobs... The chief rabbi of [Safed, who drafted the letter on which the ruling was based] gets money from taxes, including taxes from Israeli Arabs."

Among her priorities, Hoffman wants to obtain state funding for Reform and Conservative Judaism in Israel. She believes the non-Orthodox movements won't survive unless they take root in Israel, in large part because of Israel's dominant influence in the Jewish world.

Hoffman said that people in Israel's Orthodox community have worked with her to address issues of mutual concern. As well, she said she gets at least two or three calls a day from Orthodox people who don't identify themselves but encourage her to keep up her fight.

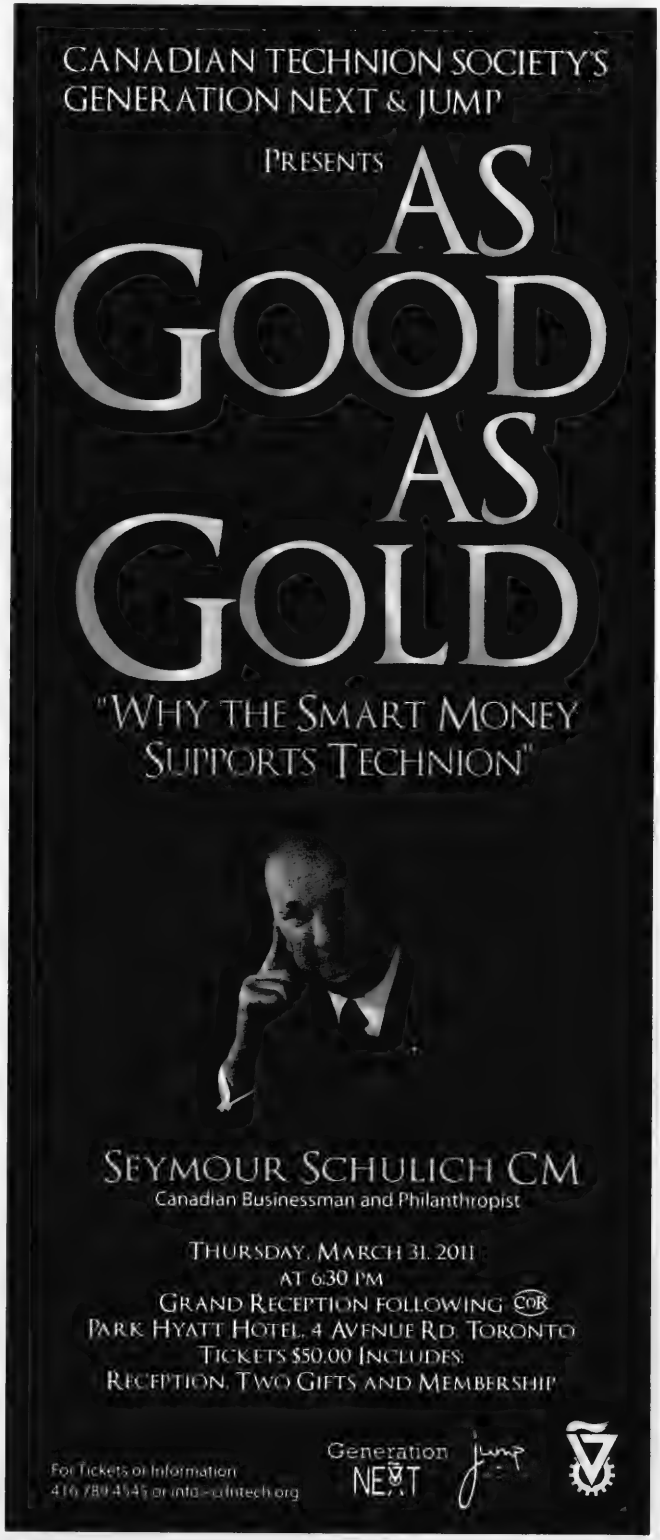
Many of the calls revolve around segregated buses, an issue on which IRAC recently published a report, which it sent to the Knesset.

A typical call, she said, was from a father of young children who can't help his wife with the baby stroller when they travel by bus, because she has to sit at the back. "This is not the Jewish way," Hoffman said he told her. "A family should sit together."

Orthodoxy has "as many voices... as many shades of black as there are colours in the rainbow, but they are silenced institutionally."

When they call her, she said, they ask her to "save us from our own rabbis."

And yet, she said, she remains optimistic. "I get pissed off. I don't get discouraged. I get really upset."



'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

We must sing together

By RABBI JENNIFER GORMAN

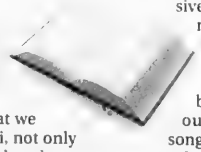
"All the people witnessed the thunder and lightning, and the voice of the shofar, and the mountain smoking, and when the people saw it, they fell back and stood at a distance." Even after all that the Israelites had witnessed in Egypt, the connection to the Holy was so overwhelming that they said to Moses, "You speak to us, and we will obey, but do not let God speak to us, lest we die."

How often in life are needs put before us, but we simply don't want to see them? Whether it's a need close to home such as a kosher food bank or an injustice elsewhere such as in Sudan, how many of us offer opinions over our dinner tables, but do nothing beyond our homes? Why do we wait for politicians, rabbis and community leaders to speak for us instead of speaking directly to the needs ourselves?

The Jewish community has a history of activism and speaking out against injustice. Since the Hebrew midwives defied Pharaoh and delivered Jewish babies alive, Jews have stood up against that which is clearly wrong. We have banded together as a global Jewish community to fight antisemitism, to bring our people out of darkness into light and to fight social injustice and inequality all over the world. Our activism and unified belief in justice crossed denominational lines to bring about change.

Unfortunately, recently there has been a splintering of this Jewish unity. The question of who is a Jew is raised all too frequently. Rather than working toward inclusion, social action and the building of Jewish identity, we challenge individuals' membership in the Jewish people.

Rabbinic Reflections



The midrash states that we all stood together at Sinai, not only those physically present, but those not yet born. The message is clear: we are one community. We all stood at Sinai together.

Rambam wrote that whoever separated himself from the community, even though he commits no transgressions, loses his portion in the World to Come. Why is this? Rambam says it's because when one separates from the community, he or she doesn't perform mitzvot with the community. That person no longer feels communal pain, but merely lives a solitary life in an individual way.

This month, the Jewish community bade farewell to a strong voice of unity. Debbie Friedman, zichronah livrachah, whose music has become so normative in the Jewish community that many don't know she wrote it, had this to say about unity, "It was kol isha [the voice of women] for col isha [every woman] that inspired me to write inclusive music. It is beneficial not only for women, but for men and children as well. Singing helps us learn how to be vocal... The more our voices are heard in song, the more we become our lyrics, our prayers, and our convictions."

We must sing together so that we can continue to "become our lyrics, our prayers, and our convictions," and to continue to stand together as one community.

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman is incoming executive director of Mercaz Canada and the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism.

A month of opportunity

This year is a Jewish leap year, which means there are two months of Adar. We're fortunate, because it allows us time to contemplate the significance of Adar and Purim separately.

The sages say that "from the time that Adar enters, joy is increased." It's a beautiful statement, because it speaks of happiness that abounds for an entire month. The curious part of the statement is whether it's prescriptive or descriptive.

In other words, perhaps the sages are describing the month, telling us that the month itself will bring elements of joy. Or perhaps they're prescribing joy to us, commanding us to increase our joy during this month. In the first option, we're the recipients of joy, while in the second, we're creators of that joy.

It seems the second option makes the most sense. How could the month itself bring joy? Clearly we're being instructed to "make merry" and kid around while we make others laugh. In Israel, there's a practice among young people to have an anonymous "Purim Buddy." If you're someone's "Buddy," you're charged with doing little anonymous acts of humour to bring a smile to that someone's face. It's a wonderful concept.

We make our own joy. We don't wait for someone to make us smile. We find the smile within us and bring it outward so that it's contagious to others. While it's a beautiful idea, it's rather strange

Midrashic Moments

By Rachel Turkienicz

for the sages to be instructing us in this way. Why not tell us to be joyous at all times and thus create a happier world? There seems to be something special about Adar that triggers the sages' observations and instructions.

The midrash teaches us a powerful detail about Adar. When discussing how God appears "behind the scenes" in the Purim narrative, one of the examples has to do with Haman's lottery. The holiday Purim is named for his lottery to pick the day on which to slaughter the Jews. It's interesting that Haman draws lots to choose the optimum day. He is, in effect, leaving it to the gods to decide which day is most opportune.

It's the perfect place for God to intervene. The lottery falls in the month of Adar. According to the midrash, Adar is the astrological sign for the nation Israel. It's when the stars are aligned in our favour.

When the sages instruct us to be happy in Adar, they're informing us of an opportunity. We construct our own happiness, and we should be doing so every day. But in Adar, the stars themselves are aligned to make us happy. We could truly increase and heighten our joy by mirroring below what is going on above.

We know in life that we certainly create our own happiness, but the midrash has taught us that sometimes you also need the stars to line up in your favour. Sometimes you need a little good mazal – the Hebrew world for constellation.

So whistle a happy tune, share your favourite joke, smile at a funny memory. Adar is coming. What an opportunity to increase our joy.

The tribe of Dan

Samson, the mighty judge, came from the tribe of Dan. He and his tribe had a love-hate relationship with the Philistines.

At the time, the Philistines were Israel's mortal enemies as they waged an ongoing war against each other for control of Canaan. It is uncanny to see the resemblance between Samson and such mythical Greek heroes as Hercules.

The tribe of Dan is particularly fascinating from an archeological and historical perspective. When we first encounter the tribe, they live near the coast of Israel, and eventually they wind up moving to the northern Galilee, where they conquer and settle in the town of Laish, now known as Tel Dan.

Tel Dan is the location of one of Israel's longest ongoing excavations, which was headed by the legendary archeologist Abraham Biran. At Tel Dan, Biran made some amazing discoveries.

One of the most spectacular discoveries was a fully preserved Canaanite gate dating to the Middle Bronze Age (circa 2000-1550 BCE). But for biblical scholars, the most exciting discovery at Tel Dan was a carved inscription found in 1993 that mentioned the "House of David." It would play a key role in the debate between the so-called minimalists and maximalists.

It was the minimalists who said that the biblical books were composed much later than the events that they discussed. The historicity of some of these events was even denied by the minimalists. They even questioned the existence of some important biblical personages such as David. The discovery of the Tel Dan stela was a major blow to their assertions.

Past Forward

By Alex Gropper

Tel Dan had some fascinating discoveries relating to the Mycenaeans. The Mycenaeans were the inhabitants of Greece in the Late Bronze Age. They have also been associated with Homer's host at the siege of Troy. Interestingly, a major Mycenaean tomb from the Late Bronze Age was discovered at Tel Dan by Biran. What makes this so fascinating is that the last phase of Mycenaean pottery in the Bronze Age is identical to the first phase of Philistine ceramics in Israel.

Even more interesting is the connection of the tribe of Dan with the Philistines. For not only have the Philistines been connected to the Mycenaean Greeks culturally through their pottery, but there is also a linguistic connection. Another name for the Mycenaeans at Troy is the Danoi. The connection to Dan here is obvious.

Furthermore, both groups are associated with ships and sailing. The Bible makes reference to Dan's nautical links. The Philistines are also shown sailing on ships as they attempted to invade Egypt by sea in the wall reliefs of Pharaoh Ramses III at his mortuary temple at Medinet Habu, which is dated to the early part of the 12th-century BCE.

There are a number of inferences that can be drawn from this information. First, ancient Israel is not as homogeneous a group as some of us may think. It also speaks to our Mediterranean heritage and the implications that it has for our traditions. Last, it links us to the rich traditions that Homer so vividly portrayed in the Iliad and Odyssey and points to tantalizing possibilities for future study.

That's Alma Denny waxing poetic about the food that has conquered bakeries, supermarkets and waistlines everywhere. More than just a piece of dough that's boiled and then baked, the bagel has a special place in Jewish cuisine and culture.

The bagel seems to date to the 17th century. Leo Rosten suggests in The Joys of Yiddish that the first time "bagel" is mentioned in print is in the community regulations of Kracow in 1610. The food was given to women in childbirth since the circular shape was seen to represent the life cycle and an omen of good luck. [http://bit.ly/bagels02]

Elsewhere, we are told of a Viennese baker in 1683 "who wanted to pay tribute to Jan Sobieski, the king of Poland. King Jan had just saved the people of Austria from an onslaught of Turkish invaders. Eating bagels can pose other risks as Elizabeth Mort found out the hard way. After the Pennsylvania woman gave birth last year, her baby was taken away when opiates were found in the mother's blood. The American Civil Liberties Union is filing the suit on behalf of the angry parents. [http://bit.ly/bagels08]

Sweetening lessons with cake and psychology

By Frances Kraft

A LESSON FROM THE TEACHER

"I want my students to remember my classroom as a place where they felt valued as human beings, and where they felt inspired to value others."

Dan Goldberg – Moreh Dan to his students at the Toronto Heschel School – believes in teaching through hands-on experience.

Last week, his Grade 5 students concluded an "excavation" by assembling pottery that Goldberg had broken and labelled himself. To teach his class about a "tel" (an ancient mound, in archeology), Goldberg brought a layer cake to school. "We 'excavated' the cake," he said. "You could see the different layers."

As well, he fashioned a grid from string so that students could divide the cake into sections, and catalogue their findings the way archeologists do. The highlight, he said, was eating the cake.

At the same time, Goldberg – who is 51, but likes to tell his students he's 88 – focuses on less tangible aspects of education. Establishing a good relationship with every student is key, he believes.

A psychologist by training, with a PhD from the California School of Professional Psychology in Los Angeles, Goldberg said he thinks a lot about "what kind of childhood [students] are having under my watch."

The Berkeley native, who grew up in Phoenix, has been involved in Jewish education for many years, having put himself through university by teaching Hebrew school.

After studying European Jewish history at Harvard University, he entered the rabbinical program at Los Angeles' University of Judaism (now part of American Jewish University), but changed direction after completing four years of the six-year program.

He was drawn to psychology because of the "relationship that you form with another human being, that somehow transforms that person."

The role of an educator is similar, he believes. "We preside over a significant portion of our students' childhood."

Fourteen years ago, Goldberg segued from his work as a clinical psychologist, when he and his wife, Netta Zweig, moved back to Toronto from Buffalo, N.Y. with their daughter, who is now 18. The couple met when Zweig, a Toronto native, was studying Jewish education at the University of Judaism.

Goldberg began to work at Beth Tzedec Congregation as director of education and youth while he was waiting to be licensed as a psychologist here. He ended up staying until 2005.

Now in his third year at Heschel, he also spent two years as head of Judaic studies at a Baltimore Jewish middle school, from 2005 to 2007.

"I felt that school was a lot of fun," he said of his decision to continue working as an educator. "I love working with children."

Goldberg believes it's his obligation to do "everything I can" to ensure that children have a positive experience.

"Part of it is being happy to see them, and you can't fake that. You have to find something about every kid that you can talk about, so that when they come into the room, you see this opportunity to connect with someone that means something to you."

Henry Waks' promise fulfilled

By Daniel Horowitz

For the past year, Henry, Fred and Jay Waks were looking for a special way to honour the family's matriarch, Sylvia, who passed away on December 20, 2009. Sylvia, a Holocaust survivor who came to Toronto in 1949 where she met her beloved Henry, to whom she was married for 57 years, was a bright, elegant woman with a passionate love and appreciation for art.

So, in order to combine Sylvia's love of Jewish values with her passion for art, they looked to UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign and the future Koffler Centre of the Arts. They decided that naming the Sylvia Dzialoszynski Waks Rotunda was the most meaningful way to honour Sylvia's memory.

And, despite Henry's untimely passing one year later - on December 7, 2010, his dream of honouring his beloved wife in this manner will still come to fruition.

"My parents were best friends and absolutely inseparable," said Fred. "They shared the same enthusiasm for art, yiddishkeit and tzedakah. Because of the war, mom wasn't able to receive the education she would have liked, but she always said 'if you're passionate about something, learn everything you possibly can about it.'"

And she clearly practiced what she preached.

"My mom spent the last thirty years of her life studying art at the University of Toronto," explained Fred. "Despite the lack of a formal education, she was extremely intelligent, well-read, and could take on anyone when it came to questions about art."

"Outside of the Basilica in Rome, this space at the new Koffler Centre would have been mom's favourite place to have her name attached to," explained Fred.

The Rotunda bearing Sylvia's name will be an area of high prominence within the new Centre. With visibility from both the external areas of the Sherman Campus as well as from the Ellen Prosserman Atrium, this uniquely designed space will welcome visitors to the rich array of programming offered at the Koffler.

"We are naming something that will be as unique as she was," said Fred. "This opportunity was the perfect fit."

"The Sylvia Dzialoszynski Waks Rotunda will be a beautiful, inspiring and welcoming space at the heart of the new Koffler Centre of the Arts," said Murray Koffler. "We share the Waks family's love of the arts and Jewish culture and are thrilled they have made this important gift to the Tomorrow Campaign."

We're sure that Henry would agree.

Young Women Determined to Make a Difference

By Suzanne Wintrob

It's a particularly good time in the life of UJA Federation's female leadership, thanks in large part to six young women who decided to engage their generation in helping to build the Jewish world.

"My mother, Lorri, is involved in UJA and she has been a model for me," says Amanda Kushnir, 34. "I saw UJA Federation as the organization with the largest influence. It covers so many important initiatives in the Jewish community, in Canada and in Israel. When I decided to get involved, it made the most sense to start with UJA because I wanted to know that what I was doing would have the most effective impact."

In recent years, the number of young adults active in UJA has grown substantially.

Impact Toronto's Young Women's Philanthropy, for instance, is geared to women aged 25 to 35 who want to connect with UJA. Chairs Robyn Goldberg, 31, and Dana Lerner, 27, are holding educational programs that will also include speakers, fitness classes, fashion events, cooking classes and much more.

"My peers and I can contribute to the strengthening of Jewish life in Toronto and in Israel by not only following in the footsteps of our parents' generation, but by trying to exceed what they have done," says Dana, an executive recruiter at Rosenzweig and Company. "The Baby Boomers have been incredible role models and we have a lot to do if we want to surpass their amazing work, which I hope we can do one day. As long as I am an active member of this community, I plan on being involved with UJA."

Robyn, a mother of three, started volunteering for UJA a decade ago by taking an active role in her university's annual campaign. When she became a mom, she returned to the fold to become a role model to her children as her parents were for her.

"Many in my peer group aren't really involved with UJA, despite the fact that their parents have been for many years," she says. "That presents a problem in the long-run because if their parents are aging and moving on and their children haven't gotten involved, where will our Jewish community be?"

Sisters Kimberley Walters, 42, and Jillian Robins, 39, echo that sentiment and, together, they chair the Women's Philanthropy Trailblazers Division for ages 35 to 45.

"Our sister Stacey and her family are living in Israel and protecting the country," says Kimberley, whose nephew is serving in the Israeli Navy. "They're doing the hard part by living there. Being involved with UJA is our way of supporting them."

Also making inroads is the Women's Philanthropy Young Women's Leadership division for ages 30 to 45. To attract new faces, chairs Amanda Kushnir and Shelley Sonshine formed a committee that came up with hundreds of new names not yet in UJA's records.

"The torch is being passed to our generation," says Shelley, a 34-year-old mother of three who admits she caught UJA fever from her in-laws, Ed and Fran Sonshine. As a woman, she was particularly intrigued watching her mother-in-law's ongoing commitment as chair of UJA's Annual Campaign and Women's Philanthropy and devoting time and energy to numerous organizations. Shelley's husband, Daniel, is chair of the Jewish Chamber of Commerce and sits on UJA's National Young Leadership Cabinet. Now it's her turn to get involved and she's excited about the opportunity to make a difference.

"Through my in-laws I've grown to see the importance of UJA to our community and to Israel, and the value of being involved in philanthropy to help carry all of these essential programs into the future," she explains. "My husband and I always knew we would continue on their path."

"We're sending personalized letters with the invitations to explain what we're doing and why," says Amanda, a lawyer and mom of two. "This will give women a better sense of what we're all about and maybe they will be inspired to come out. It's not just something to go to. It's for them, for their future and for their family's future."

Kulanu holds speed-dating event

Executive director says event serves a real need in LGBT community

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For the first time in Kulanu Toronto's 11-year history, the Jewish social group for bisexual, gay, lesbian, transgendered, transexual, and intersexed people will hold a speed-dating event.

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu, which was founded in 2000 and has been funded by Hillel of Greater Toronto since 2003, said it's about time her organization put together an event like this.

"I think there is a real need in the Jewish LGBT community to have a speed-dating event. I've spoken to a number of people who come to Kulanu events, who have said to me, 'Oh, it would be so nice to meet a guy here, to meet a girl here. Between you and me, Justine, that's one of the reasons I keep coming to these Kulanu events.'"

Apple, 34, said she is excited about the event, which will be held Feb. 10 at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at 7:30 p.m.

She said the participants will be separated by sex and age. The men and women will each have a group of 18- to 30-year-old people, and there will be another group for the over-30 crowd.

"We'll be giving instructions to tell people how they have to move around the table. When they come in, they're going to be given name tags and a number. They'll also be give a form that contains a line for the name and number of the person they've been talking to and a little check box to let us know if they want to be contacted by that person."

Apple stressed that while this event is a great opportunity to meet a Jewish partner, it is also a great way to make friends and connections.

Apple, who has been openly gay since she was 21, said that it has become easier for the Jewish gay community to stay connected to other Jews because there are many shuls that are inclusive and welcoming to gay people.

"But in terms of meeting people who are LGBT and Jewish on a more personal and intimate level, I find that it's harder to do. When you think about it, the LGBT community is a minority, and you've got the LGBT Jewish community, which is a minority within a minority. It's very hard," she said.

"Then you've got the challenge of finding someone who is a good fit for you – that's even harder," she added with a laugh.

"The other thing is, they have these speed-dating events in the general Jewish community and in the non-Jewish community, so why can't we have one in the LGBT Jewish community?"

Apple said that dating within the faith is very important to her and that being gay and Jewish are inexplicably connected.

"I grew up in a very traditional, warm, loving, Jewish home where we celebrated Shabbat and all the Jewish holidays, and as a result, I know my goal is to be with a Jewish partner... who can relate to who I am, what I believe and how I feel."

She said it took time for her to be able to connect the two major parts of her identity and gain the support from her family that she enjoys today.

Apple added she understands that coming out at any age can be "very challenging, very lonely, isolating and scary and we want them to know that they have a support system."

Justine Apple

She hopes Kulanu will inspire the Jewish community to embrace its message of inclusiveness, tolerance and respect.

"It is really important to respect a different part within the rich, diverse fabric of the Jewish community. All people and all Jews should be respected and treated with dignity regardless of their sexual orientation or gender identity," Apple said.

"We know that gay Jews make up a sizable part of our community, so we can't be ignored."

Apple said that events like these make her feel proud to be a part of Kulanu because it provides opportunities for bisexual, gay, lesbian, transgendered, transexual, and intersexed Jews (who don't fit the typical definitions of female or male) to connect with one another.

"It's really hard for that to happen at a noisy, crowded bar. This kind of event is long overdue and much needed," she said.

"Like anyone else in the community, we deserve to find Jewish mates."

Kashrut goes corporate: COR gets new CEO

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

In today's global scene, kashrut agencies can no longer afford to remain small or local. "If someone sees a COR [symbol], they shouldn't have to think a second time… they should know the standards are world class," says the Kashruth Council of Canada's new CEO, Rabbi Tuvia Basser, a Torontonian who's spent years in the business world, most recently as a senior manager with Nortel.

Rabbi Basser hopes his newly created position will allow him to exercise his strengths in both the business and the rabbinic worlds. "I can bring the best of all aspirations together with the pursuit of strengthening religious observance in the community and across the country."

Creating the CEO position shows how far the Kashruth Council has come over the last 50 years. Rabbi Basser's first challenge will be creating structures within the organization to reflect its complex day-to-day operations.

While consumers may see the Kashruth Council's "COR" symbol as just a hechsher on local restaurants or packages, that's just the tip of the iceberg. "We are the largest community kashrut organization in North America," says Rabbi Tsvi Heber, director of kashrut.

Beyond approximately 140 establishments in the Toronto area that are certified by its food service division, its industrial division supervises some 625 companies from coast to coast.

Rabbi Basser believes his corporate outlook will help the COR to "upgrade its professionalism."

The organization has grown so quickly that it has not had a chance to create a formal corporate structure, leaving major gaps, such as the lack of a formal HR department or a sales and marketing division.

"You don't think of a religious organization as needing sales and marketing," says Rabbi Basser, but "in the real world, you need a financial base. You need sales and marketing."

Rabbi Basser believes his business background will be a tremendous asset. "For-profit organizations can measure their progress – it's called dollars." With a non-profit organization, analyzing success can be tougher, but a solid business background can be helpful in implementing objective measures of success, he says.

The hurdles facing the Kashruth Council in the near future are both local and global: making kosher food available to a broad spectrum of Torontonians reliably and inexpensively while maintaining standards that are widely recognized as comparable to the "big name" international agencies.

The proliferation of private kashrut agencies, as seen in other communities, is not a good solution here. Small agencies may be "world class, reliable organizations," says Rabbi Basser, but "they are nonetheless not community organizations… serving the community's needs. It's an admirable business, but it's a business." A private agency wouldn't be "here to serve the Toronto community. COR is."

Serving the Toronto community means balancing the requirements of the many types of kosher consumers here. That group ranges from haredi Orthodox communities who might require chalav Yisrael (for dairy products) or pas Yisrael (for wheat products) certification to observant Sephardim, with their own needs for cooked foods, to non-Orthodox Jews who keep kosher and rely on the COR hechsher.

Rabbi Heber says the Kashruth Council is "probably the only kashrut organization that certifies all synagogues in their respective city – all Conservative shuls that have asked for certification."

In the last few years, the organization has actually changed some of its policies to reflect this diversity. Chalav Yisrael milk, for instance, was previously a requirement of its food service division. Now, a store or restaurant may offer non-chalav Yisrael dairy products if a prominent sign indicates their status.

Also, the council previously insisted that at least one business partner be shomer Shabbat, but a new "mashgiach temidi" (full-time supervisor) system, also recently adopted by some other major kashrut organizations, allows any business owner to be certified.

Rabbi Tuvia Basser

Then there's the global arena. "Part of being a world-class organization is to have expert insights into the issues," says Rabbi Basser. "We need top expertise." COR kashrut administrator Rabbi Sholom Adler is on the standards committee of the Chicago-based Association of Kashrus Organizations (AKO), and COR experts have led the way in recent controversies over raisin infestations and fish parasites.

But the Kashrut Council is also still thinking local. "If we can get a more secure financial base, we'd like to expand into the breadth of services that the community needs,not just what's more profitable," Rabbi Basser says.

It already offers many other services, such as in-home seminars on checking produce for insects or the kashrut of alcohol products, along with supermarket tours and regular recipe publications, "kashrut alerts" and annual lists of approved Passover products. They'll even help you kasher (make kosher) your home.

Educating consumers could go a long way in a community that sometimes wrongly blames the organization for its kashrut woes, such as the high cost of kosher food or perceived inconsistencies in catering fees.

When it comes to catering, Rabbi Heber cautions that the organization's charges are standardized, but may not always be passed on accurately. "If you see a 'supervision fee' [on a catering bill], that is not necessarily our fee."

As for Rabbi Basser, he's still feeling out what this city needs from its main kashrut organization, listening to the many stakeholders, including ordinary shoppers.

"I don't know whether the consumer is my customer or my employer. I'm more inclined to think of the kosher consumer as my employer. One way or another they're going to let me know what they want."

There's no doubt he's aiming high, and looking to give the Kashrut Council's COR hechsher the kind of ubiquity on store shelves that the OU hechsher enjoys in the States. "I would like to feel that COR can do that… in the Canadian scene and perhaps beyond."

'We must preserve Israel as an option for future generations'

"We must preserve the State of Israel as an option for the future generations. The children did not decide to leave Israel, their parents did," he added.

A similar theme was expressed by federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky, at the opening ceremony.

"Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's attitude [pointing to the advantages of connecting with Israelis living abroad] changed the relationship between Israel and Diaspora Jewry forever," Sokolsky said.

There are believed to be about one million Israelis in the Diaspora, mostly in North America, with others in Europe and Australia.

In the GTA, 85 per cent of all Jewish immigrants are Israelis, said federation board chair Elizabeth Wolfe.

But "building an Israeli community abroad and maintaining the Israeli culture are not easy tasks", said Gidi Grinstein, president and founder of Reut Institute, an Israeli policy group that provides strategic support to Israeli leaders and decision-makers, speaking at the first plenary session.

"The Israeli identity is too weak to be preserved in the Diaspora conditions, and keeping the identity of the future generations is a great challenge. Statistically, the future generation will become either Jews or Canadians or both, but not Israelis. The third generation will probably have no close relative, no friends and no memories from Israel, and that is the major concern," Grinstein said.

"Israelis abroad should also fight the delegitimization that the State of Israel is going through," he added.

Israelis abroad should keep the cultural elements of Shabbat, Grinstein said. They should also see synagogues as part of their culture and their communal identity.

Other elements that Diaspora communities should focus on to help keep the link to Israel as a mother homeland strong, conference participants were told, include the Hebrew language, Jewish holidays, Israeli culture and Israeli history.

Along with UJA Federation, conference sponsors were the Jewish Agency for Israel, Mishelanu and the Israeli Ministry of Diaspora Affairs, who hope to hold similar events in the future in Israel and other Diaspora cities with an established Israeli community.

Israel hopes to draw Christian tourists, rep says

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

After a record year, the Israel Ministry of Tourism's new commissioner for North and South America is very pleased.

"It's become a hot destination," New York-based Haim Gutin, who has held the position since September 2010, said of Israel.

"I'm happy that this atmosphere is changing," Gutin, speaking last week at the Park Hyatt in Toronto, added.

"Canadians particularly... are looking for value when it comes to choosing travel destinations," Jerry Adler, marketing and public relations director for the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, said. "[They're] looking for something that's an all-encompassing experience, and that's something Israel has to offer."

Haim Gutin

Israel welcomed 3.4 million tourists in 2010, an increase of 20 per cent over 2009. Of that number, 77,000 came from Canada. The goal for 2011 is to see 100,000 Canadians visitors and four million visitors in total. By 2015, the Tourism Ministry hopes to attract five million tourists every year.

One of the markets the ministry is looking to court is the Christian one, Gutin said.

"In the Canadian market, we are going to invest about $350,000 in... advertising. A good portion of our budget is going to be invested in the Christian market. We have found that [a lot of] tourism in the next few years in Israel is going to be from the Christian market."

In the Jewish community, the office's 2010 media campaign – which featured the slogan "There's a little bit of Israel in all of us" and photos of Israeli attractions – will be used again in 2011, but with different photos and featuring new attractions. The ministry also plans to target Montreal by running the ads in French.

Over the next few years, Gutin noted, a number of luxury hotel chains are coming to Israel. The Waldorf Astoria is opening a location in Jerusalem in 2012, while a Ritz Carlton is slated to open in Herzliya. Kempinski aims to open in Tel Aviv in 2013.

"All those chains that are known all over the world are showing interest to invest money in Israel. That's a result of the good atmosphere," Gutin said.

When asked what he thinks accounts for the surge in visitors to Israel, he cited a change in the worldwide atmosphere.

"I think that... people understand that terrorism is a global issue, it's everywhere... [The 3.4 million people] coming to Israel shows that it is a normal destination.

"I think people understand that Israel... has so much to offer. The added value of it is very high," he continued.

"Something about people's perception changes [when they visit Israel]... Once they [come], they'll never be the same."

Activist compiles her speeches

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Over the past 27 years, Julia Koschitzky has given some 150 speeches as a high-level lay leader of the Jewish community in Toronto and internationally.

Prompted by the death of her mother to sort through her own files, she ended up going through her speeches and culling about one-third of them to include in a book primarily meant for family and friends.

It's Been My Privilege, published recently by Malcolm Lester in a run of just 500 copies, spans the years 1983 (when she wrote her speeches in longhand) to 2010 (by which time she'd switched to the computer), in approximately 230 pages.

"The whole theme is the centrality of Israel," Koschitzky told The CJN in a recent interview at her home.

A former chair of the Keren Hayesod world board of trustees, Koschitzky made her first major foray into voluntarism at Associated Hebrew Schools, which her four children attended.

It was serendipity that drew her to the greater Jewish community, when she was invited to a brainstorming session on how to involve Orthodox women in United Jewish Appeal.

"Had I said no, or found an excuse, I would have missed out on the most glorious moments of Jewish history," she said. "I've seen the good and the bad, and the ugly and the beautiful."

In one of her speeches in the book, Koschitzky recalled seeing former U.S. president Bill Clinton take a bow tie from a waiter and personally affix it to then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's shirt collar, after he noticed that Rabin didn't have the requisite neckwear at a black-tie event. It was evident to Koschitzky that the world leaders' relationship "went beyond the 'correct' formal exchanges."

Other historic moments covered in the book include Israel's 40th, 50th and 60th birthdays, Operation Exodus and Operation Solomon, several wars, and the Oslo accords.

Julia Koschitzky

Koschitzky begins with a foreword about her family background, which she also wrote about as a contributor to Rosalie Sharp's 1997 book Growing Up Jewish: Canadians Tell Their Own Stories.

Born in Cardiff to German-Jewish parents who fled Berlin after Kristallnacht, Koschitzky, née Podolski, came to Canada in 1948 at age four with her parents and sister. After six years in Montreal, they settled in Toronto.

Serendipity also played a role in Koschitzky's life when she was a young teenager. "My parents gave me money to take piano lessons," she recalled. "I thought, 'This is a waste of money. I do not have a musical ear.' I told my parents I'd rather take that money to find an elocution teacher."

Although she has forgotten her teacher's name, she can still recite by heart the words to Theophilus Thistle, the same tongue twister that Colin Firth recites as King George VI in the movie The King's Speech.

Seeing the movie recently, Koschitzky, who won a public speaking award as a student at Northern Secondary School, had a sense of déjà vu, she admitted.

Mid-interview, she retrieved a worn black book filled with carefully hand-written elocution notes, and leafed through it. "Many of the exercises were the same [as in the movie]," she said.

At one time, Koschitzky, who married her husband Henry at age 19, considered a career in radio or television.

"I never planned my career in Jewish communal life. It just kind of happened."

In retrospect, reading the speeches was "an out-of- body experience."

She recalled travels to South Africa, South America and Europe, including a speech she gave in Berlin and her awareness of how fortunate her parents were to escape when they did.

As well, she said, seeing the revival of Jewish life in the former Soviet Union – and remembering the first wave of Jewish immigrants – was "incredible" and served as a type of closure for her. Through her work, she said, the Jewish world has become her extended family.

School project captures survivor's experiences

By LAURA STRICKER
Staff Reporter

Lea Hochman sits at a small desk facing seven students, one teacher and a video camera. The wall behind her is decorated with posters of everyone from The Beatles to Dalton McGuinty and Homer Simpson to Martin Luther King, Jr.

Hochman is at Crestwood Prepatory College, speaking to this small group as part of the school's Oral History Project, which consists of videotaped interviews with community members who share their wartime stories. Hochman, 89, is a Holocaust survivor from Pohorce, a small town in Poland.

The Oral History Project was established by Scott Masters, head of the social studies program at the school.

"I thought it would be a good idea to try setting my students up in small groups with either survivors or military veterans," Masters, whose grandfathers are war veterans, says.

As Hochman talks about her Holocaust experience in great detail, the students are hesitant to interrupt, asking questions only with her encouragement.

While she now talks about her struggle for survival during the Holocaust at length, it took many years for that to happen, Hochman's daughter, Sheila Miller, says.

"She kept it in for so many years, and when my daughter started really pushing her – not just my daughter, my sister's children too… She would always retreat. It was always hard for her. She would tell them a little bit and she would have to stop.

"For the first generation, for me, it's painful – it's painful for her to speak, it's really painful for me to listen," Miller adds. "For my daughter, who's another generation removed, it's much easier."

Her mother's testimony was first recorded by Eli Gotz, another survivor, for the Holocaust Centre of Toronto. Hochman's memory of what life was like in her small Polish town at that time provided a very clear picture for Gotz, Miller says.

"Because she still remembers so much, she was able to give [Gotz] a really good picture of what life was like in the small village at that time… The first thing she did [in the interview] was mention every person that was killed in her city. She knew every single one.

"Now she drags other survivors to her apartment and shows them her video and begs them to record their stories."

"I want to leave the legacy for people who don't believe that something like that existed," Hochman says.

"I am very happy that I was able to come today and to let some other kids see that if you are very anxious to survive, you'll do anything for your survival," she continues. "If one child learned anything today, I'll be happy."

"I think what Lea was talking about today was fantastic," Masters says. "The kids can read about it in books, they can watch documentaries, and we do all that, but this gives them a chance to get something deeper, which I think is pretty valuable.

"[The response] has been very good. Some kids have really taken to it. Of the kids that were sitting in on the project today, I think a few of those kids have done five, six, seven interviews over the years."

JDL protests against Peto outside anti-Israel lecture

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Members of the Jewish Defence League gathered in the rain last week to protest Jenny Peto, a featured speaker at an anti-Israel event and the author of a controversial master's thesis that accuses Jews of using Holocaust education to maintain a victim identity.

On Jan. 18, Peto, a Jewish pro-Palestinian activist who recently published a widely criticized thesis titled "The Victimhood of the Powerful: White Jews, Zionism and the Racism of Hegemonic Holocaust Education," spoke at a lecture titled "Speaking the unspeakable: Exposing Israeli Apartheid and the violation of Palestinian rights."

The event, held at the University of Toronto, attracted an audience of about 200, as well as 35 members of the JDL, who protested by waving Canadian and Israeli flags and carrying a banner that read "Stop supporting the Muslim Brotherhood," said Meir Weinstein, JDL's national director.

"We stood out in the rain... outside the venue," Weinstein said. "It was peaceful. We had one guy on a megaphone."

He said they chanted slogans such as "Say no to hate."

The National Post reported that some of the JDL protesters wore balaclavas and masks, but Weinstein said they were just wearing hats and ski masks to protect themselves from the rain.

According to the Post, Peto said the controversy surrounding her thesis and attempts by the pro-Israel community to speak out against it simply strengthens the Palestinian solidarity movement.

Peto, a member of the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid, said that the criticism stems from "the desperation of pro-Israel groups who are frantically trying to crush criticism of Israel... through bullying and intimidation."

But Weinstein countered that Peto is the bully in this situation.

"It's a complete fabrication what she's saying. This is just another excuse to try to silence the Jewish community," he said.

Other featured speakers at the event, which was organized by the Ontario Public Interest Research Group Toronto and the Palestine Freedom of Expression Campaign, included Toronto Star columnist Antonia Zerbisias and Canadian Arab Federation president Khaled Mouammar.

New 'centre-right' McGill news website backs Israel

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

Frustrated students at McGill University founded a new online student news source this month to counter what they call "left-leaning" and "anti-Israel" tendencies in other campus media.

The new centre-right outlet, called the Prince Arthur Herald – which bills itself as "Canada's premier student news source" – will offer alternative coverage of Israel and other news from a conservative editorial perspective.

"Unfortunately, McGill suffers from the same grave misunderstandings of Israel that many Canadian campuses do," co-editor Brendan Steven said.

Although the Prince Arthur Herald will feature student life, culture, and Canadian politics, part of its mandate is to cover Israeli and international politics.

"The evidence was all around us that our ideas and our values had no forum to be heard," co-founder Kevin Pidgeon wrote in his first editorial.

"Council has, semester after semester, been a repository of centre-left moderates to the most radical and far left ideologies university can offer."

Prior to the Herald's establishment, students could choose to read either the McGill Daily or the weekly McGill Tribune.

Brendan Steven

Steven described the McGill Daily as a left-wing newspaper with an anti-Israel editorial stance.

Pidgeon wrote in the Herald that "the McGill Daily continues to happily opine against not simply the right wing, but against capitalism, democratic institutions, the Israeli state, and anything remotely related to the right wing."

The Tribune, according to Steven, is a moderate centre-left paper that generally avoids Middle Eastern politics in order to steer clear of controversy. But both papers have published articles that describe Israel as an "apartheid state"and have accused Israel of ethnic cleansing.

"The anti-Israel movement on campus is extremely strong and well organized," Steven said.

"An [Israel Defence Forces] soldier once came for a simple lunch to meet with Jewish students, and a group of activists protested outside complaining that he was recruiting for the Israeli army."

In the last few years, events such as Israeli Apartheid Week have grown in popularity on campus, and a McGill radio program reportedly blamed Israel for the 2004 atrocities at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison.

In contrast, the Herald recently published an opinion piece called "The Left vs. Israel" which accused the political left of baselessly denigrating the Jewish state.

"We are fortunate at McGill to have a very strong Jewish community that is vigorous and passionate in its defense of Israel," said Steven, who runs the Herald with Pidgeon.

According to its homepage, the Herald will provide a home for moderate students to offer hard-hitting analysis and real debate.

The Herald can be found at princearthurherald.com.

Politicians support boycotted Montreal shoe store

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Conservative member of Parliament Steven Blaney has accused those demonstrating for the boycott of a Montreal store selling Israeli shoes of acting like "economic terrorists."

Blaney came in from the Quebec City area Jan. 14 to show his solidarity with the owner of Boutique Le Marcheur, whom he feels is being unfairly targeted by anti-Israel protesters.

On Jan. 20, Blaney issued the statement: "By distributing fiery tracts, accosting and haranguing customers and passersby to discourage them from entering the store, and threatening the store owners, these activists are engaging in practices verging on economic terrorism."

Blaney, who represents Lévis-Bellechasse, maintains that the civil rights of the store's owners, the Archambault family, are being jeopardized by this "economic terrorism."

Earlier he had stated, "In Quebec, free circulation of goods is a fundamental right. M. [Yves] Archambault has the right to choose the product that he wants to offer his clientele without having to be subjected to intimidation and threats... that are in total opposition to Quebec values."

Blaney said he admired Archambault's "courage" in not yielding to the demand that he stop selling Israeli-made footwear, a tiny proportion of Le Marcheur's inventory.

The pro-Israeli boycott group Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) has been picketing outside the store on most Saturdays since the beginning of October.

Blaney was among several Quebec federal and provincial politicians who have stopped by the store recently to lend their support and, at least in the case of Marlene Jennings, Liberal MP for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine, to buy merchandise.

On Jan. 15, she joined a group of politicians at the store while a small number of PAJU picketers were outside.

The others were Marc Garneau, Liberal MP for Westmount-Ville Marie; Howard Liebman, assistant to Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who was out of town; D'Arcy McGee Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman, and Action démocratique du Québec (ADQ) Shefford MNA François Bonnardel.

ADQ leader Gérald Deltell and Martin Lemay, the Parti québécois MNA who represents Ste. Marie-St. Jacques, the riding in which the store is located, earlier visited to show their support.

The Quebec-Israel Committee also received letters last week from PQ leader Pauline Marois and Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe affirming their support for Archambault, and the PQ's refusal to support any boycott of Israel.

"The boycott... is actually anti-democratic and it actually fuels and supports anti-democratic movements," Jennings said. "Israel is a democracy. The shoes that are being sold are being produced legally in Israel, imported into Canada legally and sold by Le Marcheur legally."

One politician who has not returned is Québec solidaire co-leader Amir Khadir, MNA for neighbouring Mercier. Khadir took a drubbing in the Quebec media for his participation Dec. 11 in one of the pro-boycott demonstrations.

Khadir did, however, speak out against the recent vandalism of Jewish institutions in Côte St. Luc and Hampstead. In a joint statement with party president Françoise David, he denounced the attacks as "scandalous" and "odious."

"Such acts have no place in a democratic society... As a society, we must reject the least expression of antisemitism, or of hatred based on religion or ethnic origin."

Anti-boycott activist Sharon Freedman said the presence of politicians of different stripes shows "this is a non-partisan issue, because it tears at the values that make Canada the envy of the world."

Quebec-Israel Committee communications director David Ouellette hailed the politicians' participation as "demonstrating the marginality of the anti-Israel boycott campaign in Quebec and the obsessive anti-Zionism of Amir Khadir."

"Shame on Amir Khadir," Bonnardel declared. "There are causes far more commendable than attacking a small businessman who participates in the economic life of Montreal for 25 years, who gives work to people and pays his taxes."

He said Archambault is the victim of "injustice at the hands of pro-Palestinian fanatics."

WINTER WORDS: Robbins Hebrew Academy Beth Tikvah campus students Zachary Wayne, in Grade 2, and Ashley Krakower, in Grade 1 worked co-operatively to make a winter word bank, which they turned into a winter acrostic poem.

Pier 21 monument to St. Louis unveiled

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — "If Canada had taken a stand [in 1939] and opened its doors to people on the MS St. Louis, probably 620 of them would have passed through these halls [at Pier 21 in Halifax] seeking Canada's promise of peace and prosperity."

With those words, Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney bemoaned the actions of Canada's government in the 1930s.

"My predecessors led to the tragedy of the St. Louis," he continued at a Jan. 20 ceremony at Canada's Immigration Museum at Pier 21. The St. Louis sailed from Germany in 1939 with 937 Jewish passengers seeking a life free of persecution. The ship was refused admittance to Cuba, the United States and Canada, and sent back to Europe, where two-thirds of the passengers eventually perished in concentration camps.

"'None is too many' became the policy of the Canadian government because of indifference and political subterfuge," said Kenney. "Today I say Canada will never close its doors to legitimate refugees who need our help."

A monument, called Wheel of Conscience, was unveiled by the minister and designer Daniel Libeskind, a world-renowned architect and the son of Holocaust survivors. The large round metal sculpture has moving intermeshed cogs denoting hate, xenophobia, racism and antisemitism on one side and the names of those who sailed on the St. Louis engraved on the other.

"Today we remember those who were consumed by the Holocaust and those who survived it," Kenney said. "Today, we are learning our own history of antisemitism and teaching people to contemplate this memorial, teaching that hate can lead to xenophobia which leads to racism and can lead to antisemitism."

The unveiling was witnessed by more than 200 people, including members of Parliament, members of the provincial legislature and city officials. Canadian Jewish Congress president Mark Freiman and CJC executive director Bernie Farber also addressed the audience.

Freiman said he came to Canada through Pier 21 at age four, 59 years ago. "My parents told me it was a place of safety, possibility and a home."

He praised Kenney's vision in 2009 to take the initiative "to eliminate the stain of [the St. Louis incident] and learn from it. This project is emblematic of the partnership between government and the Congress."

Jason Kenney, Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism and architect Daniel Libeskind unveil the Wheel Of Conscience.

Through the Community Historical Recognition Program, the government allotted $475,000 to CJC to memorialize the events. Part of the funds will go to a St. Louis education program that will go to every high school across Canada, Farber said.

In an interview, Farber said that the monument and education program are "a fulfillment of a long-standing dream. It's not necessarily to memorialize the victims of the St. Louis and the Holocaust but to act for future generations. It's not really enough to create a monument but to engage the public in a productive, democratic way of responding to genocides and crimes today."

Ruth Goldbloom of Halifax, who was vitally responsible for the development of Pier 21 from a shabby waterfront shed in the late 1990s to its museum status today, and is now on the board of trustees, said, "This has such historic value. I feel as excited today as I did July 1, 1999, when 10,000 people saw us cut the ribbon to re-open Pier 21. The St. Louis happened in a dark and tragic time in our government's outlook. Today symbolizes how every ethnic group entering our country has suffered, and I hope young people will see how tragic it was to turn away people because of their ethnic background."

The manager of development and partnerships of the Maritime Museum of the Atlantic in Halifax, John Hennigar-Shuh, developed a St. Louis exhibition two years ago in conjunction with the Atlantic Jewish Council.

"The display includes a scale model of the ship and many pictures and artifacts," he said. "We want to develop a travelling exhibit and are trying to arrange use of the film about the St. Louis tragedy produced by CJC."

MC Irving Abella of Toronto, a noted author and history professor, said after the event that it "was unique. It reminds us of a time when Jews in Canada were at the bottom of society and were not always comfortable. Today, things seem to be going well in Canada with multiculturalism and openness. It used to be a very different Canada."

SHARING THE MAGIC OF TIMBERLANE

Share the Magic | CAMP TIMBERLANE

Share the Magic, now in its' sixth year, has announced that it will continue its' commitment into 2011. "This is a very special program that was established by Barry and Phil Lowes and we are very pleased that we can continue to offer this unique opportunity", says Corey Mandell, current Director and Owner of Camp Timberlane.

In 1957, Barry and Philomena Lowes pursued their dream and founded Camp Timberlane, a residential summer camp located on a private lake in Haliburton Ontario. Their vision was to create a camping experience that would build confidence, spirit and leadership. They strived to provide a nurturing environment that would recognize a person's uniqueness and where lifetime values would be learned.

The Timberlane 50th Anniversary Gala that took place in 2006 confirmed their belief that "dreams do become reality." Barry and Phil had the chance to witness first-hand that their motto of "Spirit, Integrity and Tradition" lived on through their alumni.

Barry and Phil continue to inspire. Their ongoing involvement with environmental and childhood development causes, reaffirms their commitment to children. They have always led by example and will continue to do so in the years ahead.

After 53 years, Barry and Phil are committed more than ever to their life pursuit of making camping available to the new generations of children. To make this possible, they created the 'SHARE THE MAGIC' program with the sole objective of introducing new campers to the Timberlane experience.

This program will offer up to $1500 towards the camp fees to a limited number of children aged 7 - 15 who have never been enrolled at a residential summer camp. The criteria for eligibility is outlined at www.sharethemagic.ca.

Camp Timberlane is a residential summer camp located in the heart of the Haliburton Highlands in Ontario, Canada. Now in its' 54th summer, they are located on their own private lake "Lake of Two Islands" just 2 ½ hours north of Toronto. They offer 2, 4, 6, and 8 week sessions for children ages 7-15 from all over the world.

Palestinians deny 'leaks' published by Al Jazeera

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Monday denied offering secret concessions to Israel and said that reports found in purportedly leaked documents had presented Israeli positions as those of his own negotiators.

"What is intended is a mix-up. I saw them present things yesterday as Palestinian, but they were Israeli... This is therefore intentional," Abbas told reporters in Cairo after a meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

"We say things very clearly, we do not have secrets." Abbas stressed.

On Sunday, Al Jazeera television published what it said were extracts of 1,600 documents it had obtained that cover Israeli-Palestinian negotiations in recent years.

The documents leaked so far mostly reveal secret concessions offered by Palestinian negotiators on the issues of the right of return of Palestinian refugees, territorial concessions and the recognition of Israel.

Following the release of the documents on Al Jazeera TV, the Palestinians quickly denied the reports, saying that parts of the documents were fabricated.

The chief Palestinian negotiator in the 2008 talks, Ahmed Qureia, told the Associated Press that "many parts of the documents were fabricated, as part of the incitement against the Palestinian Authority and the Palestinian leadership."

He denied making an offer about the Jewish enclaves in east Jerusalem, claiming that Israel refused to discuss the issue.

Abbas told Egyptian newspaper editors in Cairo on Sunday that he kept the Arab League updated on all details of the negotiations with Israel, according to the Palestinian news agency Wafa. "I don't know where Al Jazeera came from with secret things," Abbas was quoted as saying. "There is nothing we hide from our brothers, the Arabs."

The current chief negotiator, Saeb Erekat, dismissed the TV report as "lies and half-truths."

Al Jazeera said the Palestinians offered to let Israel keep all but one of the Jewish enclaves it built in east Jerusalem after capturing it in the 1967 Mideast war. About 200,000 Israelis live there now.

In return, according to the quoted documents, the Palestinians wanted Israeli land, including a section close to the West Bank-Israel line where many of Israel's minority Arab citizens live.

They also proposed international control of the key Jerusalem holy site as a temporary measure. The Palestinians, Israel, the United States, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan would administer the site where the Al-Aqsa Mosque compound sits atop the ruins of the biblical Jewish temples, until Israel and the Palestinians could work out a permanent arrangement.

On the issue of refugees, the documents said the Palestinians agreed that Israel would take in 10,000 refugees a year for 10 years – a total of 100,000. The Palestinians have insisted that all refugees from the 1948-49 war and their descendants – several million people – have the right to return to Israel. The Israelis have always rejected that as a threat to the Jewish character of the state.

The peace talks referred to in the documents went on through 2008, but ended without agreement when Israel attacked Gaza to try to stop daily rocket attacks by Palestinian militants.

On Sunday, Al Jazeera TV and the Guardian revealed the details of 1,600 confidential documents on negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians over the last two decades.

Erekat reportedly also proposed in an October 2009 meeting that Jerusalem's Old City be divided, giving Israel control over the Jewish Quarter, part of the Armenian Quarter and part of the neighbourhood of Sheikh Jarrah.

Further details reveal that Erekat agreed to the Israeli demand that Israel be recognized as a Jewish state.

Among other documents due to be released is an Israeli offer to transfer Israeli Arabs citizens to the territory of a future Palestinian state.

Moreover, Al Jazeera claimed that Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas was personally notified by a senior Israeli official that Israel was planning an attack on the Gaza Strip, the night before Operation Cast Lead. Israeli and Palestinian officials reportedly discussed targeted assassinations of Hamas and Islamic Jihad activists in Gaza.

Al Jazeera reported that it plans to dedicate one day to every issue detailed in the thousands of pages of documents, which are regarded as the largest leak in the history of the Middle East conflict.

The documents already released on the Al Jazeera website can be seen as official documents with Palestinian Authority stamps and signatures of several PA senior officials, in particular Erekat.

Sonia Peres laid to rest

JTA

JERUSALEM — Sonia Peres, the wife of Israeli President Shimon Peres for 66 years, died Jan. 20 in her Tel Aviv apartment at the age of 87.

Sonia Peres was a private person and was rarely seen at political events frequented by her husband. In 2007, when Shimon Peres moved into the President's Residence, Sonia Peres chose to remain in the family home in Tel Aviv.

Sonia Peres moved to pre-state Palestine from Poland in 1927 at the age of four and met her husband shortly afterward in the Ben Shemen Youth Village.

She served as a nurse in the British army, working in an army hospital near Cairo and later as a driver for the army throughout Europe.

Sonia and Shimon Peres married in May 1945, and were the founders of Kibbutz Alumot. They had three children.

Pearl's real murderer was 9-11 mastermind: probe

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Four men were wrongfully convicted of the murder of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl nine years ago, while the actual killer is the suspected mastermind behind the 9-11 terror attacks, a new investigation alleges.

The revelations, which include the allegation that a dozen terrorists involved in the killing are still at large and operating, are based on a three-year investigation by the Pearl Project conducted by journalism students and faculty at Georgetown University and the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists.

Heading the probe was Asra Nomani, Pearl's colleague, from whose house in Karachi, Pakistan, the reporter left on the day of his 2002 disappearance supposedly for an interview with a high-level terrorist source.

The four men convicted in the slaying remain in jail, but the actual killer is Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the key figure in the 2001 attack on New York's World Trade Center, according to the project analysis.

Mohammed told U.S. investigators at Guantanamo Bay that he slit Pearl's throat and severed his head, the report said, with independent forensic evidence pointing in a similar direction.

However, Washington officials decided not to charge Mohammed, fearing it would complicate their case against him in the 9-11 prosecution, the report stated.

Judea and Ruth Pearl, Daniel Pearl's parents, said they are still "trying to digest" the report and did not wish to go into details at this point.

Judea Pearl said, however, that the authors were "good and honest people who [conducted the project] with love." Ruth Pearl added that the project investigators had phoned frequently and that she and her husband had provided valuable contacts.

U.S. and Pakistani officials are accused of bungling the pursuit of Pearl's killers and then covering up the actual facts.

Turkish witnesses refused to testify

The first part of the report focuses on the legality of the blockade and on Israeli efforts to enforce it, including the raid on the six-ship flotilla. It also analyzed the identity and goals of the flotilla's organizers and passengers.

Israeli naval commandos boarded the Mavi Marmara, the flagship of the Turkish-sponsored flotilla, on May 31. The passengers on board resisted, and nine Turkish citizens were killed. The commission determined that the incident did not constitute an offence against international law, as there were clear indications the flotilla intended to break the naval blockade.

The report also determined Israel had been in compliance with the formal conditions of enforcing a naval blockade on Gaza, adding that it had also complied with the humanitarian conditions for such a blockade.

However, the report was critical of Israel's land blockade of the coastal enclave, calling on it to "examine the medical needs of the people of Gaza in order to find ways to improve the current situation."

The commission also urged the Israeli government to examine ways to "focus its sanctions on Hamas [the terror group that rules Gaza] while avoiding harm against the civilian population."

During the time of the panel's work, the report says, many Turkish witnesses were asked to speak before the commission, including the crew of the Mavi Marmara and Bolent Yeldrom, the leader of IHH, a Turkish humanitarian relief group that owned three of the six ships in the flotilla. None of the invitations were answered, the panel said.

In one case, the report went on to say, U.K. citizens who had taken part in the flotilla expressed interest in testifying before the commission. An arrangement was then made through the British government for them to testify via video conferencing, but the U.K. civilians refused the offer.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan condemned the Turkel Comission report.

The panel's two foreign observers, retired Brig.-Gen. Ken Watkin of Canada and David Trimble of Northern Ireland, both signed off on the report's conclusions.

An English translation of the 300-page Turkel document will be submitted to the UN panel that's also probing the incident. That panel, chaired by former New Zealand prime minister Geoffrey Palmer, includes Israeli and Turkish representatives.

The Turkel report's second part, to be submitted in a few months, will discuss Israel's mechanisms for investigating suspected violations of international law, as well as the government decision-making process ahead of the raid.

Meanwhile, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan on Sunday rejected the Turkel Commission's findings, dismissing its conclusions that the IDF soldiers acted in self-defence on the Mavi Marmara.

Erdogan told reporters in Ankara that the Israeli report had "no value or credibility." The Turkish foreign ministry also issued a statement, saying it was "appalled and dismayed" at the findings, which cleared Israel of wrongdoing in the raid.

Turkey has already submitted its report on the raid to the UN panel, blaming the incident entirely on Israel.

Talmud to be translated into Italian

JTA

ROME — The Talmud will be translated into Italian for the first time thanks to an official collaboration between the Italian government and the Italian Jewish community.

A protocol launching "Project Talmud" was signed Jan. 21 in Rome by cabinet ministers, the president of Italy's National Research Council, the president of the umbrella Union of Italian Jewish Communities (UCEI) and Rome's chief rabbi.

The project foresees the translation of the original Aramaic version of the Babylonian Talmud, with commentaries, as well as an introductory volume about the structure, contents and language of the Talmud.

UCEI president Renzo Gattegna said the initiative demonstrated how "the cultural collaboration between state institutions and the reality of Italian Judaism has assumed new awareness and meaningful commitment."

Yad Vashem launches Farsi YouTube channel

JTA

JERUSALEM — Yad Vashem has launched a YouTube channel in Farsi and an expanded version of its Farsi website.

The Farsi YouTube channel launched Sunday contains survivor testimonies, archival footage and minilectures by Holocaust historians on topics such as contemporary antisemitism and what makes the Holocaust a unique historical event.

The comprehensive new website includes a chronological and thematic narrative about the Holocaust with related video, photos, documents and artifacts, as well as frequently asked questions about the Holocaust, a lexicon of terms; online exhibitions, including a multimedia presentation of the Auschwitz Album in Farsi, and stories of Righteous Among the Nations.

Addressing viewers on the YouTube channel, Israeli President Shimon Peres welcomes visitors to the site.

"History is rich in events, but there is one event that is exceptional, which is a watershed. That is the Holocaust, when a cultured nation in an organized manner killed six million people because they were Jews, including a million-and-a-half babies and children," Peres says. "What we suggest is that each of you will see the material, which is based on records and on photos, to understand what happened, and also to be able to tell your own children to beware, not to let history fall again to such a depth, to such shame," he said.

"One of our primary goals is to make credible information about the Holocaust accessible to as wide an audience as possible," said Avner Shalev, chairman of Yad Vashem. "Today, when there is so much disinformation and distortion easily available online, we provide an alternative to anyone who is interested in the truth."

Yad Vashem's website and YouTube channel are available in English, Hebrew, Arabic, Russian, Spanish and Farsi.

Iran's regime is 'really a paper tiger'

By ARIE RAIF

If Israel takes military action against Iran, it will be one of the most significant decisions in the history of Israel and the most dangerous.

Iran's nuclear capability is questionable. According to senior Mossad officials during prime minister Ehud Olmert's as well as the current Netanyahu administrations, Iran's goal is primarily to boost its influence in the Muslim world.

Attacking Iran now will drag Israel and the world into an all West-Islam confrontation.

Israel's enemy today is the Iranian regime not the Iranian people. According to a senior Israeli official, "Iran's regime is creating an image of itself as a scary superpower when it's really a paper tiger…"

Iran's "warships" are more than 30 years old. Its combat aircraft, including F-4s, Mirages, F-5s and F-14s, have not flown in years for lack of spare parts, and the army divisions and brigades are so only in name. The Pasdaran revolutionary guards, always described as "elite," walk around as if they have won many a war, but have actually fought only one war, against Iraq, which they lost.

An attack on Iran will lead Israel into a trap that will destabilize the region, eliminate the prospects for a future solution between Israel and its neighbours and will cost more Israeli lives.

Launching a long-range air strike against some 225 hidden targets in Iran entails huge risks and uncertain rewards. The claim that the Iranian people are united in patriotic support for the nuclear program is nonsense.

In the first place, the Iranian people is a complicated national grouping. Out of a population of 70 million, 51 per cent are ethnically Persian and 24 per cent are Turks or Azeris, with other minorities comprising the remaining quarter.

In addition, there is considerable unrest in the country. Many of Iran's 16 to 17 million Turks are in revolt against Persian cultural imperialism. The country's five to six million Kurds have started a serious insurgency. The Arab minority detonates bombs in Ahvaz and Baluch. Tribesmen attack the regimes gendarmes and revolutionary guards. Many of the Persian majority oppose the theocratic regime, either because they have become post-Islamic in reaction to its many prohibitions, or because they are Sufis, whom the regime now persecutes almost as much as it does the small Baha'i minority.

Therefore emphasizing the country's national unity is a myth. But by attacking Iran, Israel might in fact unite the disparate groups.

If – and this is a major if – Iran attains nuclear military capability, will it use this capability?

There are many factors to take into account.

It has realistic fears of a retaliatory or a pre-emptive strike by other nuclear-armed countries. There is a realistic, valid concern over a widespread destabilization of the whole region.

The last Iranian elections – widely considered stolen by the regime from the rightful winners – exposed large cracks in public support for President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's regime. The West must not stir things up in Iran now. Any agitation would only close divided ranks and possibly wipe out the opposition, which has yet to say its final word. The subversive, domestic processes must be allowed to do their work. Outside sources must refrain from interfering under any circumstances.

An Israeli attack would abruptly destroy the opposition and unite the people in support of their leader. Military humiliation would lead to increased support for the ruling ayatollahs.

There is no need to hear the repeated declarations by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his aides (in particular his national security adviser Uzi Arad) to understand that the state of the Iranian regime and the perception of the looming Iranian nuclear threat has become a political tool for the Likud.

According to a U.S. embassy cable released recently by WikiLeaks, a leading expert on Iran advised the United States to use "covert sabotage" rather than military action to destroy the Islamic Republic's nuclear facilities. Citing a January 2010 cable dispatched by U.S. Ambassador Philip Murphy, the Guardian reported that Germany's state-funded Institute for Security and International Affairs had told U.S. officials that a policy of sabotage would be "more effective" than a military strike in stopping Iran from developing a nuclear bomb.

According to the cable, Volker Perthes, director of the institute was referring to actions such as "unexplained explosions, accidents, computer hacking, etc." He said they would be more "effective than a military strike, whose effects in the region could be devastating."

Comment

The Guardian reported that the cables showed that U.S. officials, including former secretary of state Condoleezza Rice, had "distinctly deferred" to Perthes for guidance on Iran-related matters.

In an interview with the Guardian, Perthes confirmed the details of the cable, saying that indeed "'unexplained accidents' or 'computer failures,' etc., are certainly better than military strikes," adding that "a military escalation with Iran must be avoided."

The New York Times reported that Israel had tested a computer worm believed to have sabotaged Iran's nuclear centrifuges last year and slowed its ability to develop an atomic weapon. In what the Times described as a joint Israeli-U.S. effort to undermine Iran's nuclear ambitions, it said the tests of the destructive Stuxnet worm had taken place over the past two years at the Dimona complex in the Negev desert.

The newspaper cited unidentified intelligence and military experts familiar with Dimona who said that Israel had spun centrifuges virtually identical to those at Iran's Natanz facility, where Iranian scientists are struggling to enrich uranium.

"To check out the worm, you have to know the machines," an American expert on nuclear intelligence told the newspaper. "The reason the worm has been effective is that the Israelis tried it out."

Outgoing Mossad chief Meir Dagan recently stated that the timetable for an Iranian bomb has been pushed back to 2015. There is therefore no present need to send bombers to Natanz. His conclusions may have undermined the preferred views of Netanyahu and his defence minister Ehud Barak.

Support for Israel does not mean blanket approval for its government's polices. One does not show one's love of and support for someone by remaining silent when he or she is doing something counterproductive.

The policies of the government of Israel are distinct from the country and the people of Israel. To be sure, they overlap. But they are not the same.

Israel has been at war every seven years. It replaces its government approximately every two years. Yet it is a country full of life, restless and stronger than its leaders.

The country has suffered 22,570 casualties in its many wars and daily struggles. As the poet Nathan Alterman has written, they are the "silver platter" on which the country has been delivered to its people.

To undermine Iran's threats, Israel should make peace with Syria and the Palestinians. Senior Iranian officials have said that any peace between Israel and the Palestinians would be acceptable to them. This would destroy the basis for Iran's threats. So, why attack?

Are we repeating former U.S. president George W. Bush's stories of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq?

Facts do not cease to exist because they are ignored.

We need statesmen who think about the next generation and not politicians who think about the next elections.

Ross tries to restart talks

Senior White House adviser Dennis Ross arrived in Israel to discuss security arrangements under a possible peace deal with the Palestinians. Ross and David Hale, deputy to Middle East envoy George Mitchell, arrived in Israel last week. They were to meet with Israeli officials to discuss maintaining the country's qualitative military edge in the region under any proposed peace deal, according to a statement issued by the Israeli Prime Minister's Office. Ross was making his third visit to Israel in a month.

Livni cancels S. Africa visit

MK Tzipi Livni cancelled a scheduled trip to South Africa due to a strike by Israel's Foreign Ministry workers, the ministry said. Palestinian activists' groups disputed the reason given by the Foreign Ministry to the South African media, saying the threat of being arrested on war crimes charges for her role in the Gaza war is what made her decide to nix her trip. Livni, Israel's opposition leader and head of the Kadima Party, was slated to visit South Africa at the end of the month as a guest of the Jewish Board of Deputies, the South African Press Association reported. The Media Review Network, a South African group dedicated to dispelling stereotypes about Muslims, told the Press Association that it had instructed its attorneys to secure an arrest warrant in accordance with the Rome statutes, to which South Africa is a signatory, "which obligates all member states to honour their responsibility in the prosecution of war criminals."

Land exchange proposed

Israeli media reported that a pro-Israel U.S. think-tank released proposals that would reconcile allowing a majority of the settlers to stay in place with a Palestinian state through commensurate land swaps. The detailed proposal released by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, nods to longstanding Palestinian demands for a return to 1967 lines by adhering to one-to-one land swaps. Under the proposal, 68 to 80 per cent of settlers would remain in place, and the Palestinian state would receive Israeli land adjacent to the Gaza Strip, the Sinai Desert and parts of the West Bank.

Functional training improves balance, strength

FITNESS CORNER
BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

A 2009 study in the Journal of Strength and Conditioning Research found that people who exercised using functional training methods increased their strength by 58 per cent, improved their balance by 196 per cent and decreased joint pain by 30 per cent.

What is functional training? Why is it important and how can it help us in our daily lives? Functional training is defined simply as any physical activity that trains your body for everyday, real-life situations. Basically, if you want to be able to climb stairs as you age, you must do step-ups. Functional training uses body-weight exercises that teach your muscles to work together as a team, which enables you to move freely and avoid injury.

Originally developed and used by physiotherapists to restore strength and response to the body after injury, functional training can be performed by anyone at any fitness level and will increase range of motion, strength, ability and balance.

Traditional isolated training such as seated exercises or movements involving single muscles, such as bicep curls, doesn't require core muscles to stabilize. Weak core muscles lead to poor balance, posture and back pain.

Isolation exercises increase muscle mass and strength by fatiguing individual muscles, but they don't teach the muscles to work together. Therefore, isolation exercises are not very effective in strengthening our ability to do everyday activities, such as lifting, bending or both. Functional training emphasizes the body's ability to move in the way we were designed to move.

For instance, if you want to continue to get out of a chair without help, squat. It helps train your muscles to work together as a team to increase strength, co-ordination and balance.

Functional exercises are tailored to your daily activities or sports interest and can be done anywhere without equipment. (If you've never exercised before, make sure you consult your doctor and hire a professional to help you.)

'Bear' adviser tells clients to invest overseas

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

At a time when many analysts and money men are predicting good times ahead for investors in the United States and Canada, one prominent bear is sounding a note of caution. Actually, it's more like a shout than a gentle warning and more of a prediction of doom and gloom than a gentle hint to take care.

Peter Schiff is a Connecticut-based economist and investment guru who is telling his clients to take their money and put it abroad: in emerging markets, Asia, parts of Europe – the countries with sound financial structures – pretty much anywhere but the United States.

Peter Schiff

For all the fiscal stimulus, monetary easing and stable tax rates that have other analysts drooling, the United States is going down, he believes.

"The U.S. economy is in major trouble and getting worse every day, and the government is interfering every day, stimulating artificially and making it worse," he said.

Canada has imported some of the Americans' "irresponsible monetary policy" [of low interest rates], with the risk of inflation picking up in the future as well.

Schiff, CEO and chief global strategist of Euro Pacific Capital Inc., a brokerage based in Westport, Conn., was in Toronto recently to launch the firm's Canadian office.

A regular presence on U.S. business programs, Schiff also hosts an online radio show and is author of four books, including the 2007 Crash Proof: How to Profit From the Coming Economic Collapse. A follower of the Austrian school of economics, Schiff favours free enterprise, reduced regulation, limited government intervention in the economy and letting the market take its course.

He believes government interventions of the past couple of years designed to head off an economic catastrophe are completely wrongheaded. In fact, he said, they're going to make the problem worse. What's needed instead is for the government to get out of the way and allow a recession to correct all the misallocations of capital and overspending.

Though the stock markets in both the United States and Canada have soared since their lows of mid-2009 (the Dow is up about 79 per cent since then, though still off by double digits from its all time high), "there's no recovery. That's why it's jobless," he said. "The economy is not getting better, because we're spending more borrowed money. That makes gross domestic product [GDP] go up, but it actually means it's getting sicker. We'll need to pay it back with interest and that's when the trouble arises."

Being a bear in a bull environment is nothing new for Schiff. In 2006, he sounded a warning about the housing bubble and its deleterious effect on all manner of consumer credit. He warned against owning financial institutions, which he called "toxic."

A regular on a number of American business shows on Fox, CNBC and Bloomberg Television, he was subjected to plenty of ridicule from experts who predicted sunny skies ahead when he was forecasting disaster.

On one episode of CNBC's Kudlow & Company, he made the case, far in advance of the recession, that a major downturn was coming because Americans were doing too much consuming and borrowing and not enough producing and saving.

Eventually, he predicted, consumers, who accounted for 70 per cent of GDP, would spend less and save more, especially "when they see their home equity evaporate."

That's a pretty accurate representation of what eventually transpired, though at the time, fellow panellists scoffed at him and chuckled on air at his apparent outlier beliefs.

His prognosis at the time: "The disease is all this debt-financed consumption. The cure is that we stop consuming and start saving and producing again. And that is a recession. Sometimes medicine tastes bad, but you've got to swallow it."

Now, several quarters after the economies of Canada and the United States went from contraction to slow growth, many advisors and analysts are predicting a good year ahead for the stock markets in Canada and the United States. Schiff, however, isn't buying it. Stock prices are going up, he acknowledged, but that's because of all the loose money being inserted into the economies that drives prices up. In the United States, he continued, the dollar continues to erode, making all gains merely paper gains, as the dollar's purchasing power goes down.

With quantitative easing – the Fed's insertion of hundreds of billions of dollars created by their printing presses – inflation will result, he said. "Inflation is already here. It's just a question of recognizing the fact."

But aren't inflation rates in Canada and the United States still only around two per cent or less he's asked.

"The government's way of tracking inflation is flawed," he replied. The government underestimates inflation to produce "the illusion that it is lowering it so people think it's doing better than it is."

What you'll see by next year, he continued, is a yield of more than six per cent on 10-year government bonds (3.33 per cent last week), reflecting inflationary pressures.

"The United States is now a drag on the world because we spend too much and borrow too much."

As for Canadian investors, "there's a lot less risk in the Canadian market, but I still think it makes sense to diversify overseas." He is advising his Canadian clients to "have some exposure to agriculture, mining and oil," and other resource and commodity stocks, particularly abroad.

When the U.S. "implodes," that will put Canadian investors in a better position to ride out the storm, he suggested.

Intel to produce next generation chip in Israel

JTA

JERUSALEM — U.S. chip-maker Intel Corp. will invest $2.7 billion (all figures US) to upgrade its plant in southern Israel.

The Kiryat Gat plant will start producing the next generation of 22-nanometre chips in December, Intel announced last week.

The investment in upgrading the plant includes a $210-million grant from the Israeli government.

Intel also will be hiring 1,000 new workers for the new production line. It will be the second plant in the world to manufacture the new chips.

The company already employs more than 7,000 people in Israel. In October, Intel said it would invest up to $8 billion to develop and fabricate its first 22-nanometre processors, known as "Ivy Bridge." The Ivy Bridge design will be what's known as a process shrink – an existing design manufactured on a finer manufacturing process, with a corresponding cut in power or increase in clock speed – of the upcoming "Sandy Bridge" chip, PC Mag.com reported.

Casino Jack is smart, sassy and sardonic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

George Hickenlooper's Casino Jack riotously traces the downfall of the savvy political lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The film, which opens in Toronto Jan. 28, is smart, sassy and sardonic, examining the baneful influence of lobbyists in Washington, D.C.

Abramoff, a born-again modern Orthodox American Jew who was born into a wealthy family in Atlantic City, was the ultimate lobbyist, a staunch Republican who ingratiated himself with members of the U.S. Congress and had direct access to the White House.

A fast-talking, charming corner-cutting operative known for his bang-on celebrity impressions, Abramoff took a great fall when he was caught up in a scandal. Convicted of defrauding U.S. Indian tribe casinos and corrupting public officials, he was sentenced to a six-year term in a federal prison.

Kevin Spacey, in a brilliant performance, portrays the roguish, ethically challenged wheeler-dealer, who was recently released from jail. He has plenty of juicy material to work with, thanks to Norman Snider's first-rate screenplay, which is inspired by real events.

Hickenlooper, who died shortly after finishing the movie, directs it with wit and panache. He has a cynical attitude to U.S. domestic politics, and judging by the sharp and sleazy characters who inhabit Casino Jack, his approach is justifiable.

Kevin Spacey turns in a brilliant performance in Casino Jack.

In the film, Abramoff lobbies hard for U.S. garment manufacturers based in the Mariana Islands who blatantly flout American labour laws and for Indian tribes seeking to protect their gambling interests through tax evasion.

Paid an unconscionably exorbitant fees to service their accounts, Abramoff is portrayed as an observant Jew and dedicated family man who bought influence in Washington by means of payoffs to well-placed politicians, including the powerful Tom DeLay, the former House of Representatives majority leader who once described Abramoff as "one of his closest and dearest friends."

Abramoff's partner in crime, Michael Scanlan (Barry Pepper), a showman par excellence, shares his appetite for razzle-dazzle deal-making.

Apart from courting pols such as DeLay, who was recently convicted of money laundering, Abramoff associated with a less-than-honest businessman, who is played robustly by Jon Lovitz. A disbarred lawyer who sells mattresses, he is so shady that Abramoff's long-suffering wife (Kelly Preston) urges her husband to cut him loose.

The late Canadian actor, Maury Chaykin, in a cameo role, depicts a rumpled Italian American hitman hired to rub out a recalcitrant Greek American gambler who rebels when he discovers he has been fleeced by one of Abramoff's loutish associates.

Although Casino Jack deals with a sober subject in political corruption, it never takes itself too seriously. The sly humour, taking aim at hypocrisy in high places, is omnipresent and entertaining.

But the star of the show is Abramoff, who usually wears a black fedora, kippah or baseball cap. He's a likeable cad, rationalizing lobbying as "American-style democracy in action," buttering up allies on Capitol Hill with fat checks and pretending that tax evasion is merely a "technicality." He also channels tainted funds into a Hebrew school he has established, the Eshkol Academy and Sports Center.

Turfed out by his employer, Abramoff – a former movie producer best known for the low-budget shlock flick Red Scorpion – goes to Hollywood to pitch a film, a biblical epic in which Russell Crowe stars as Moses leading his people out of Egypt to the Promised Land.

When his machinations unravel in scandal, he finally admits he was a tad too "greedy" and "let down God." Consigned to prison after his "friends" abandon him, he's forced to admit that a pet like a dog is better than having a "friend" in Washington.

Shot through with wild humour, snappy dialogue and trenchant observations, Casino Jack is a stellar feat of filmmaking.

Singer to perform in Israel despite boycott pressure

JTA

R&B and soul-singer Macy Gray will be performing in Israel after all.

After asking her fans on her Facebook status whether to cancel a scheduled concert in Tel Aviv, the singer of the 2000 hit I Try said in a Twitter message that she would make it to Israel.

"Dear Israel fans. Me and the band will be there in 20 days. Can't wait. See you then. Peace," read the Twitter message sent last Wednesday night.

On Jan. 17, Gray asked her fans in a Facebook status whether she should cancel scheduled concerts in Tel Aviv "in protest of apartheid against the Palestinians.

"I'm booked for two shows in Tel Aviv. I'm getting a lot of letters from activists urging/begging me to boycott by not performing in protest of apartheid against the Palestinians. What the Israeli government is doing to the Palestinians is disgusting, but I wana go. I gotta lotta fans there I don't want to cancel on and I don't know how my not going changes anything. What do you think? Stay or go?" read the Facebook status update.

The status got more than 4,000 responses. Most urged Gray to stay away from Israel and thanked her for supporting the Palestinian cause. Others urged Gray to come and see the situation for herself.

Gray is scheduled to perform in Tel Aviv on Feb. 11 and 12.

Another Facebook page called Macy Gray: Please Cancel Your Show in Israel, established late last year, had more than 307 likes.

Gray performed in Israel in 2008 and 2009. She also performed in Caesarea in 2000.

Play examines the cost of denying one's identity

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

What does it mean to be Jewish? How does our identity define us? These are some of the heady questions raised in Eternal Hydra, co-produced by Crow's Theatre, and opening at Factory Theatre tonight.

Written by Toronto playwright Anton Piatigorsky, Eternal Hydra follows a fictional book written by Gordias Carbuncle, the pseudonym of an Irish Jewish writer who lived in Paris in the 1930s. A modern-day academic finds this manuscript and brings it to her publisher. One of the publisher's other writers is interested in the find as well, because her new novel features Carbuncle as a main character.

From this launching point, other narratives begin to blossom, shuttling the audience from 1930s Paris to Civil War-era New Orleans.

In an interview, Piatigorsky, 38, says Judaism plays a role in the play. "Carbuncle has abandoned his Judaism, and he's tried to hide it and obscure it from himself and other people," he says.

"This play examines the costs and effects of denying your own identity." He adds how antisemitism also surfaces in the production, saying, "It affects the personality and problems faced by this Jewish writer in the '30s and is used as point of comparison between the black experience."

The question of identity is not only pointed at Jewish characters but also at the black author who wrote about Carbuncle.

Anton Piatigorsky

Eternal Hydra is structured like a detective story with suspense to keep the audience hooked, the playwright says. Flashes of humour add some necessary levity, too, he adds. "All the characters are obsessive people, and very quickly their obsessions become funny and make them do and say irrational things in absurd situations."

Piatigorsky first wrote the play as a one-act production in Stratford in 2002, inspired by "big modernist books written by James Joyce," he says. He began thinking about the personalities behind the writer, and the historical circumstances involved in creating such weighty novels. He infused the play with research he conducted on 1866 New Orleans and 1930s Paris, making sure the dialogue and mannerisms of each era were reflected accurately in the play's flashbacks.

He later brought the play to Toronto's Buddies in Bad Times Theatre in 2009, where it earned four-star reviews and was lauded for its balance – several asides provided enough humour to temper the denser themes coursing through the play, one reviewer noted.

Piatigorsky says the play's message resonates with him strongly. "There are questions about what rights does a writer have to a story, and that's something I've thought about with my own writing."

And what should the audiences be left with after watching Eternal Hydra? "They should leave with a heightened sense of the complexity of the moral issues surrounding ownership and identity."

As heavy as that sound, Piatigorsky says "it's also a lot of fun, too."

Eternal Hydra runs from tonight to Feb. 12 at Factory Theatre, 125 Bathurst St. For box office information, call 416-504-9971.

The Montreal rapper behind iPad commercial riff

By ROBERT COLLINS
Special to The CJN

You've heard that insistent piano riff that accompanies the ever-present iPad TV commercial?

That's the creation and latest triumph of Montreal's Chilly Gonzales, whose real name is Jason Beck.

He is a rapper and comedian, and also happens to be a virtuoso pianist. His bestselling album remains 2004's all-instrumental Solo Piano.

His latest album, Ivory Tower, is partnered by a movie of the same name that he co-wrote. The film recreates the movie Rocky in the world of tournament chess. He's come a long way since launching himself as the sole Berlin-based Jewish-Canadian rapper.

"Calling myself a Jewish rapper had a nice ring to it," he says. "It carries with it a lot of cultural weight. We can argue about whether it's appropriate, or funny or poetic, but it gets a reaction. It's not my job to argue one way or another. It's my job to start arguments."

Perhaps Gonzales' most striking argument is that what he's doing isn't art, but entertainment. And for an entertainer, he can come across as taking himself overly seriously, whether he's discussing his Guinness World Record for longest solo performance in May 2009 or his well-publicized piano battle with American punk rocker and entertainer Andrew WK that same year.

"To me, being competitive is the most dramatic way to differentiate my approach from most people in the world of hipster music, for lack of a better term. I look for things to make me different," Gonzales says.

"I'm a Guinness World Record holder. That tells people I'm competitive, and I have a prodigious musical memory. I played 222 songs in 27 hours, and I got better as time went on."

The paradox of being a brilliant musician who's also a talented self-marketer isn't lost on Gonzales. It's all part of the creative entertainment process.

"I have an ability to imagine myself through the audience in front of me. The act of marketing, which is a creative fun thing, is a way to pre-emptively say things that people could say about you. Anything an audience can think about me, I've already thought of it. No one can ever accuse me of being self-indulgent or doing it for myself. That's what defines an entertainer rather than an artist," Gonzales says.

"I'm not against artists. Some of my best friends are artists! But you haven't heard of them. And the reason is they don't care. The reason I'm talking to you is because I care what people think. Someone who doesn't care what people think wouldn't bother doing an interview or a concert. That's a real artist, the real deal. That's what everyone else pretends to be. People become entertainers the minute they try to communicate. You can't say you care what people think but only to a certain degree so you can live from what you do. That's selfish."

The independent movie Ivory Tower, which premièred last year at the Locarno Film Festival in Locarno, Switzerland, may introduce Chilly Gonzales to entirely new audiences. Early signs are more than promising.

"We won second prize and came within an inch of winning first prize," he says. "It appears that the freshness of our rule breaking edged out the sloppiness of that rule breaking. We've fooled people on this one."

Gonzales stars in the movie along with other Canadian singers Feist and Peaches and Montreal DJ Tiga Sontag.

It's about two chess-loving brothers who fight over the chessboard and a woman.

"Chess is one of those areas, like jazz music or religion, where you can really run your life around the rituals of its little world. It's a good starting point to talk about self-indulgent, naive, purist expression versus cold, hard, capitalist revenge fantasy pragmatism. The movie talks about those two things."

Gonzales, who currently lives in France, is on the road a lot performing mostly in Europe. "What works best for me is going out and playing live. That's why I do between 100 and 150 shows a year. That's what I'm an expert at," he says.

"[But] to be a uniquely live phenomenon, a comedian playing live at festivals, isn't what I want. For better or worse, making albums is where I need to be."

a Hamburger in a Pita
Directed by Ari Weinberg
March 2-13, 2011
This world première comedy introduces us to two secular Jewish families: the Canadian-born Liebermans and their new Israeli neighbours, the Noys. Differences of mentality and mannerism lead to tension, but when their children fall in love with each other and discover Judaism, the parents find that they have much more in common than they thought.

Barney's Version's acid satire softened in the movie

The recent release of a film adaptation of Mordecai Richler's Barney's Version, alongside the resurgence of interest in the novel and Richler's writing life, position him at the pinnacle of the Canadian Jewish literary tradition.

A surprising outcome this, considering his comments in a London-based 1961 interview regarding the needlessness, not only of a Canadian writing life but of Canada itself. "Nobody's quite sure what our culture is," he told his CBC interviewer, "or indeed if we have a national culture." It was time, in Richler's view, to "join the United States and stop defying the logic of politics and geography."

In retrospect, one can see that such provocative views attracted interest to Richler's work throughout his career. This stance was his version of a countercultural view, since he tended to dismiss the broader counterculture. He was unmoved by the student movement, by Toronto's Yorkville folk music scene, or by the rise of leftist anti-Americanism in response to the Vietnam War. Nor did he find common cause with the rise of feminism or post-structuralism in the 1970s and '80s.

A decade after his death in 2001, Richter has come into his own as a national icon, a part of the mainstream cultural industry and pop culture that he lampooned in early novels like Cocksure and The Incomparable Atuk. When these books came out in the 1960s, Canadian national identity was feeling its oats and neither made much of an impact.

Ironically, Barney's Version (Random House) returns to a similar kind of fun-making and eye-poking – mass culture and Canadian cultural authorities come in for repeated drubbing – but Canadian readers since the novel's publication have been willing to take it on the chin and laugh.

Richler's Barney Panofsky, before the edges were softened by cinema, is a tart curmudgeon who shares many of Richler's own dislikes. Barney directs jibes at "mediocrity's holy trinity: the Canada Council, the Ontario Arts Council, and the City of Toronto Arts Council." Toronto is presented familiarly, as a tight-laced no-fun zone. Arriviste Westmount Jews, late in life, wear laquered hair, designer gear and talk like faux British lords and ladies. Student rebels are pampered, their mommas on the fringe of demonstrations with warm sweaters and cocoa. Westerners who write letters to CBC shows are boobs (Edmonton, Richter famously quipped, is the "boiler room" of the country) with vapid, sentimental memories.

In a book that depicts the enduring charms of family and street life in Montreal, Barney cannot resist a detailed description of the early '40s, when a "merry throng... marched down the Main... smashing plate-glass windows in Jewish shops and chanting, 'Kill them! Kill them!"

Like Richter over the course of his career, Barney returns repeatedly to Auden, Spender and Yeats for wisdom. As voices from a wiser and sadder time, these poets' words support Barney's characterization of the "young today" as historyless and privileged. Writers representative of youth culture in the postwar era, such as Jack Kerouac and Allen Ginsberg, are mere typers, howlers, lacking the weight and craft of their forebears.

This sort of nostalgic cultural critique haunts previous Richter novels, in particular St. Urbain's Horseman, which is arguably a more satisfying read than Barney's Version. But in the earlier book these ideals belong to a character – Jake Hersh – whose own insecurities make his views of the past haunting, linked as they are in complicated ways to World War II.

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

In Richler's final novelistic take on these themes, readers have tended to take Barney's musings as a ripe and wily cultural critique that stands on its own terms. In Italy, "Barneyano" – the spirit and form of Barney's wit and politically incorrect views – has been celebrated by journalists as a position from which to lampoon contemporary foibles.

To make the movie adaptation of the novel travel, much of the narrative's local colour had to be erased. Montreal itself is present, but the Quebec-related commentary is entirely gone to ensure an audience in the United States, where Quebec separatism is not a hot sell. And Paul Giamatti's portrayal of Barney is less Falstaffian, less roguish than Richler's character. In the movie, Barney is a generation younger, so his nostalgia is necessarily for a different time and place. The core of the novel, according to the film's screenwriter, is a love story, and surely this is a key aspect of the book – Barney's touchingly deep respect and care for his third wife, Miriam.

It is serendipitous for Richler's legacy that his often acid satire is softened and transformed into a more generic story of love lost and then pined after. Richler's career followed this route, as he stood out first as the country's critic-in-chief, became a cultural icon before he died, after which he has been fondly remembered. The late-career creation, Barney Panofsky, fits the way many readers want to remember Richter himself.

Norman Ravvin's new novel is The Joyful Child, from Gaspereau Press. He is chair of the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Suicide bombing bill passed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A private member's bill that explicitly includes suicide bombings in the Criminal Code has received royal assent and awaits government proclamation.

Bill, S-215, championed by former senator Jerry Grafstein and shepherded through parliament by Senator Linda Frum and MP Kelly Block, passed six years after it was first introduced.

It's a "made in Canada solution to a problem that is plaguing western countries... Its effect is far-reaching," Grafstein said.

The bill, the first of its kind anywhere, will criminalize any action that assists or promotes suicide attacks, including recruiting bombers and inciting the crime. "So, if you justify suicide bombing under a religious code, that would offend the criminal law," he said.

As the bill proceeded through the Senate and House of Commons, it found support from a broad cross-section of Canadians, including five former prime ministers. Jean Chrétien, Kim Campbell, Paul Martin, Joe Clark and John Turner all backed the bill through a support group called Canadians Against Suicide Bombing (CANASB). They were joined by other prominent political figures such as Ed Broadbent, former NDP leader; Roy McMurtry, former chief justice of Ontario; Ralph Klein, former premier of Alberta, and Preston Manning, former Reform Party leader, as well as many others.

Jerry Grafstein

Grafstein said the law goes beyond providing law enforcement officials with another tool against terrorists. "The purpose of the criminal law is not just to put people in jail if they break the law," he said, "but to act as an educational tool for the public to move it to a different standard of conduct."

The bill received all-party support, indicating there is broad consensus to explicitly make suicide bombing "unacceptable" in Canadian society, Grafstein said.

During its long voyage through parliamentary committees and hearings, concern was raised that a conflict might develop between the criminal law and religious freedom. Passage of the bill puts that argument to rest, Grafstein believes.

"You can't have a religious defence for advocating suicide bombing. Not in Canada."

CANASB vice-president Salim Mansur said the bill gives the government the legal basis to go after the entire organizational structure of those who advocate suicide bombing.

Mansur, a professor of political science at the University of Western Ontario, said the bill "became a test case of where Canada stands in dealing with this kind of horrendous activity. The fact is we are also on the radar of Al Qaeda" and its local supporters, such as the Toronto 18, the group that planned to bomb a number of Toronto targets and behead the prime minister.

As if to reinforce the case for the bill, last week police arrested an Edmonton man, Sayfildin Tahir Sharif, on allegations he orchestrated 2009 suicide bombings in Iraq that claimed the lives of American soldiers. The arrest was made pursuant to an extradition request from the U.S. government, not under the new law.

Mansur said the all-party support for the bill sends the message that Canadians will take a stand "and send the message to those people who want to harm us."

"We're the only country in the world that put onto the books a law that names the problem and that can hopefully be a model for other countries," he added.

Grafstein said he planned to contact legislators in the United States to see if there's an appetite to push for a change to U.S. law to specifically criminalize suicide bombing. He'll then take his effort to other Commonwealth jurisdictions, starting with Britain.

Shul attacks went unreported

The committee "did not want to pre-empt them," he said.

Additionally, there was concern over triggering copycat incidents and handing a "victory to the vandals" by generating publicity, but that changed after the Jan. 16 vandalism due to the "cumulative effect" of having several incidents take place since September 2009.

On Jan. 16 this year, three synagogues and a school in Cote St. Luc, one synagogue in Hampstead, and another synagogue in NDG – the Shaare Zedek, discovered only the next day – were hit between 2 a.m. and 3 a.m., all with single rocks thrown through their windows.

All the targets were within a few minutes drive of one another.

Police were expecting to be able to confirm the sequence of this year's attacks based on video evidence.

The story quickly "went viral" around the world. B'nai Brith Canada described the vandalism as a "wave of attacks on Jewish institutions" and said it summoned up memories of the 2004 firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs school in St. Laurent.

But Bissonnette said while the vandalism of synagogues could be a potential hate crime, once an arrest is made, "we will know for sure.

"We will know that only when we have all the facts."

Bissonnette said police had planned to wrap up "most of its investigation" of the Jan. 16 attacks by last Friday, with the odds of making an eventual arrest hinging on being able to clarify surveillance camera images enough to see the face of the perpetrator and confirm his car's model and year.

Bissonnette said there was still no evidence to indicate that the attacks this year, despite being co-ordinated and planned, were the work of an organized group "with a particular cause," since no one has claimed responsibility or left behind any notes at the scenes to that effect.

Bissonnette said solving the case is a priority. Officers from Station 9 have extensively interviewed those living in the neighbourhood of the institutions hit, as well as municipal workers and anyone else who might have seen or heard something in the early morning of Jan. 16, a particularly cold night when people tended to stay inside.

The station also has its own detective focusing on the case and is using its own "specialist" to get more detailed images from the surveillance video – a challenge, Bissonnette said, given the nighttime darkness at the time of the vandalism.

Police have also been in constant and close consultation with relevant police stations – such as PDQ 11 in NDG and PDQ 26 on Decarie Boulevard – and with community and security officials at Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC), Federation CJA and B'nai Brith.

The Jewish community entered a more heightened state of alert in the wake of the vandalism. Police boosted patrols around synagogues in Cote St. Luc, Hampstead, and Notre Dame de Grâce and met with synagogue and Jewish school officials. As well, teachers were asked to review lock-down procedures with students.

Bissonnette said that while there was an understandable sense of trauma felt by the Jewish community, some solace could be taken from the fact the attacks were against buildings and not people.

After a workout, what's better than a nice nosh?

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Is there any group of finely tuned, elite athletes that doesn't like to end a strenuous workout with a little nosh.

Maybe a little tuna salad, some home-cooked potatoes, a bagel with shmeer. How about a nice cup of coffee to round it out? After all, you need energy to keep your physique in fighting trim.

OK, so no one will mistake any of the participants at the Bloor Y's monthly breakfast shmooze-arama for Olympic-calibre athletes. They may not even be the best sportsman or woman on their street. But who cares? The food is good, and the camaraderie is even better.

One Tuesday a month, except in the summer, about 30 to 40 members of the Miles Nadal Bloor Jewish Community Centre get together after their morning workouts for breakfast and a shmooze. It's a tradition that's been going on "for decades," said Harvey Kolodny, whose efforts pull the whole thing together.

Although Kolodny, a retired professor at the University of Toronto's Rotman School of Management, can't pinpoint exactly when the breakfasts began, they evolved out of a tradition in the centre's men's health club. A bunch of guys used to gather Sunday mornings, play cards, have breakfast and discuss pressing issues of the day, sometimes in the steam room. Women were eventually allowed in, "after warning the men to put their towels on," he said.

Those were the days when participants "used to give out awards" as well as commemorative T-shirts.

"We gave out weight awards called 'piggies' for those who didn't meet their weight targets," Kolodny explained.

Sometimes, in the spirit of neighbourliness and, no doubt with the welfare of the overweight sportsmen in mind, "we wrote letters to their wives explaining that their husbands were piggies," Kolodny said.

Why the women wanted to become party to these hijinks remains unclear, but eventually the Sunday morning shmooze-fest developed into a fully gender neutral event.

Kolodny believes opening up the breakfasts to a wider range of members "created a more social atmosphere. I know a lot of people on a first-name basis now," he said.

Eleanor Levine loves the monthly gatherings. A member of the JCC for 37 years, she lives a 10-minute walk away, allowing her to attend as many as six times a week.

Her routine includes a workout, "but in all honesty I spend as much time in the shower and socializing as in the gym," she said.

"There is a group of women who come first thing in the morning, who get together for their workouts from 7:15 to 8:15. By 8:45, we're in the Second Cup [part of the centre] having coffee, and then we go to work."

She loves the monthly breakfasts. "It's a very welcoming place," she said.

Unlike Levine, who lives nearby, Annette Segal faces a daunting journey to get to the JCC. For the past 20 years, for five days a week, she's gotten in her car at 7 a.m. for a 45-minute drive that starts out at Bayview and John in Thornhill.

For years until she retired recently, she worked at King and Bay streets, so the JCC was on her route. She still makes the trip. "My family all think I'm nuts."

Despite what they think, "I can't give up this place."

She enjoys the sense of community at the centre. "If you're not around for two or three days, someone calls to see if you're alright," she said.

Friendships and confidences develop in the women's dressing room.

"We all talk, and if you have a problem, you can bring it here. They'll all help you," she said. "It's a support system. They'll help you with everything, except the names of their cleaning ladies."

At 81, Coleman Bernstein is one of the more senior members of the centre, which he first joined some 35 years ago. He's at the JCC on average four times a week, where he walks the treadmill and rides a stationary bike.

The place has changed a lot since he first joined, with a lot of the members now not being Jewish, he said.

Bernstein, who also runs the chapel – a lovely room on the third floor dedicated to his brother, Michael, killed in action during World War II – chats up the members to ensure there's a minyan every Thursday and Sunday.

Like the others, he enjoys the monthly breakfasts. "I see the buddies I've known for years," he said.

A TALL GUEST: Sacramento Kings' Omri Casspi was the special guest at a recent UJA Federation of Greater Toronto/El Al Canada event where he schmoozed with students from UJA's Kachol Lavan supplementary school and Tzofim Israeli Scouts. Casspi is the first Israeli to play in the NBA.

Students live in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem during gap year

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

If you're a Jewish young adult looking for a meaningful, life-changing experience filled with fun, learning and self-discovery, then Aardvark Israel is for you.

Aardvark Israel was founded in Feb. 2010 by Keith Berman and Debbie Goldsmith to maximize the number of young Jews coming to Israel. With more than 150 years of combined experience in Zionist educational endeavours, the staff of Aardvark provide a dynamic and exciting program that allows students to connect more deeply with their homeland.

Deena Hassan, recruitment co-ordinator, said Aardvark Israel is a unique program that deserved a unique name.

"We looked at names and youth culture and determined that unusual names were popular – Lady Gaga, Glee, Avatar," Hassan said.

"Also, we see the aardvark as an animal that is grounded – close to the earth in a way we want to see our students connected to the land of Israel."

The premier program of Aardvark is the Aardvark Israel Gap Year. It's a nine-month university program for students ages 17 to 20. The Aardvark Israel Semester Program offers a five-month option to students ages 18 to 22 who can't spend a full year away from their home campus.

The Aardvark Israel Gap Year combines immersion into Israeli society, service to the community through volunteer work and internships, and learning about Israel and Judaism through formal academic and informal educational encounters.

As a fully accredited university program, students may earn college credit for their coursework.

Hassan said that of the 70 students currently enrolled in Aardvark Israel, 11 are Canadian. In recent years, there has been an upsurge in interest in gap-year and semester programs as high school graduates are being encouraged to invest in personal growth for a year before entering university, she said.

Recent studies have shown that students are better prepared for success in university if they spend a year maturing and learning about themselves after high school, Hassan said.

In this program, students are immersed in Israeli society, serve their communities and learn about Judaism, through internships and field trips.

The Aardvark experience provides a forum for students to decompress, do something different, foster independence and creativity, and prepare for university life.

The Aardvark Israel programs are based out of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. Participants live in furnished apartments in desirable neighbourhoods, spending six months in each city.

Students have the opportunity to shop for groceries, cook their meals and clean their apartments under the supervision of qualified counsellors, Hassan said.

"Tel Aviv was just voted by the Lonely Planet [website] as the third-best city in the world to visit. It is such a vibrant, dynamic city, and Aardvark is virtually alone in offering our students a chance to live there."

Hassan said students regularly participate in excursions throughout Jerusalem and Tel Aviv as well as the northern and southern areas of the country.

These field trips include visits to museums, historical sites, a variety of communities and nature reserves. Different excursions are offered to students who have little prior experience in Israel and to those who have previously toured the country.

As part of their responsibilities as participants in the program, Aardvark Israel students are expected to contribute to Israeli society, Hassan said. Between 12 to 16 hours per week are dedicated to internships, community service and volunteer projects.

Students are given a range of choices and are placed at sites that match their interests and skills. Options include working with the ambulance service Magen David Adom, teaching English in schools and helping out in soup kitchens, animal shelters and retirement homes.

"Students interested in career journalism are able to volunteer in media and political think-tanks, which help them formulate their academic interests when they go on to college," said Hassan.

"Similarly, students interested in social justice, environmental causes and special needs learn from each other's experiences and about themselves and how they fit into the bigger Israeli picture."

With programs that include a volunteer portion, students learn the importance of giving back to their community and often see direct results. Once the students return to their university campuses, they will have memories that will positively affect the rest of their lives, she said.

Fundamental to Aardvark Israel's establishment is the commitment to offer programs at affordable prices in order to make high-quality Israel experiences accessible to as many young adults as possible.

All Jewish recent high school graduates and university students are encouraged to apply. For more information, visit www.aardvarkisrael.com.

Aardvark Israel participants volunteer at a soup kitchen in Jerusalem as part of the community service aspect of the program.

My ideal husband's ideal wife

New to Canada

By Nina Shenhav

"Meir's going on and on about dieting," I complain as I take a bite of my doughnut.

We sit, two friends and me, at the coffee shop, shooting the breeze.

"Well," says Sharon, "You did gain some..."

I cut her short. "Not me, Sharon, him. He thinks he's fat, and by the way, thanks a lot!"

Sharon takes a sip of her cappuccino, and Suzy enters the conversation.

"I think Meir looks great. I like my men darkish," she adds, eyes sparkling.

"Easy, girl," I respond. (I love it when I have something someone else wants.)

"Actually, I like my men bald," Sharon says. "There's something charming about bald men." We all agree.

"As for me," says Suzy, "I don't like them so tall. I need to look my men in the eye. I don't want to feel small and vulnerable. And I hate muscles. Too intimidating. If I want a bodyguard, I'll hire one." We all nod.

I smile shyly. "I have a fetish, if you will. I love... fat men."

There, I said it. "I adore big, huge, chubby guys. Give me some fat arms, double chins, and please, please, give me a chubby, soft, hairy, pot belly. Add a Jewish nose, thick glasses and I'm... oh, yeah!"

My friends look at me, shocked. "That sounds like fun," Suzy says as she gently wipes my sweaty forehead.

"Would you like some cold water?" asks Sharon, looking for the waitress.

"I'm fine!" I say, embarrassed.

"I thought we were just being honest."

"Sure, sure," says Sharon. "Are we talking George from Seinfeld?" she asks.

"George, Newman, you choose," I reply.

"You're entitled to your own taste. Men like all kinds of women, too. Take my husband, for example," she says.

"No thanks!" I interrupt. (Did you think I'd let her diet remark just slide by?)

"No, seriously," she continues, ignoring my poison. "My husband likes his women short. And I'm not saying that because I'm short, either!"

I agree. "No, you're saying it 'cause he's short."

Suzy chimes in again. "And my hubby? He adores curls!" (She pets her afro dreamily.)

"And my Meir, his ideal woman looks exactly like me!" I chirp.

I return home and tell Meir all about my coffee chat.

"So Suzy said I was her type?" he asks, smiling.

"That's not the point." I say. "The point is that we all have different tastes. Tell me what it is you like in a woman."

"I'm not falling for this one, again," he says. "Last time we had this conversation, you didn't talk to me for a week."

After I assure him it won't happened again, he begins, "OK, let's see... she'd have to be tall, slender yet very busty, blond with long hair, with lush lips and blue eyes."

I push him and slam the bedroom door shut. "OK!" he shouts from behind the door. "No blue eyes. She can have green eyes!"

I'm furious. And I'm not talking to Meir for at least a week!

Jewish paranoia

Urban Writer

By Avrum Rosensweig

"It's because I'm a Jew isn't it?"

How many times have you sat quietly while one of our local organizations, leaders or community members accused someone of antisemitism or anti-Israel sentiment when, in fact, the motivation of the speaker, writer or non-Jewish leader was anything but?

The situation this month involving the Bay stores and Ahava cosmetics from Israel was a good example of this.

As you might recall, Ahava products were pulled from the Bay's shelves at the same time a virulent anti-Israel group, Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East, was calling for a boycott of Israeli goods.

Ultimately, we learned from Bonnie Brooks, CEO of the Hudson's Bay Company (in a joint statement with the Canada-Israel Committee) that the products weren't selling well and were being re-branded, and, therefore, the chain was curtailing sales, for a while.

The Bay's timing was poor, but clearly there was no anti-Israel motivation in its decision.

And while the shelves were cleared, a well-oiled machine – consisting mainly of hard-right bloggers and others caught in the maelstrom – began to churn. Unresearched communiqués flew through cyberspace, calling for a boycott of the Bay and the destruction of its high-interest-rate credit cards. Individuals and groups such as B'nai Brith accused the chain of caving in to anti-Israel boycotters. Even after statements were made clarifying the situation, B'nai Brith continued to criticize the Bay and said it should consider advertising in B'nai Brith's newspaper to make amends for its bad judgment.

It was embarrassing to the entire Jewish community. It was also wrong.

So we jumped the gun. It happens. In a world of instant communication, in which many don't hesitate for a moment to vilify the Jewish state, one can understand the motivation. But at the end of the day, we sullied the reputation of a chain that has been carrying Israeli products for years.

The Bay stated clearly that it had no interest in joining an anti-Israel boycott, a stance that could have a great impact on other retailers. It did exactly what we expect of it. We screwed up.

So what do we do now as a people that pursues what is just? We apologize. We publicly call for our community members and others to shop at the Bay. As people who know what it's like to be falsely accused, we declare that it's time for our family to buy a new towel set at our local Bay store.

But if we decide that we will stand firm and believe that the Bay is anti-Israel, we are doing a tremendous disservice to the company, and even more so to ourselves. Effectively, we are alienating our allies, blaming our friends and humiliating ourselves by taking a position that stores such as the Bay are guilty even when proven not guilty.

B'nai Brith would have acted in our interest, and done what was right, by being contrite and stating loudly that it misread the situation and responded incorrectly.

When antisemites clash the cymbals of hatred in our ears, we should be grateful that goups such as B'nai Brith exist. They, like Canadian Jewish Congress, do a fine job, mostly. We are fortunate to have them watch out for us.

But when they're wrong about a group, company or person – when someone has no intention of weakening Israel – let's accept that reality and act like menschen.

Shop at the Bay. The company deserves our apology.

Egyptian protests are Israel's opportunity

Aluf Benn
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Egypt's revolution is understandably causing anxiety in Israel. The nightmare scenario of a collapse of the Mubarak regime and creation of an Islamic republic across the border has for years haunted Israel's leaders.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu spoke on Sunday of "efforts to maintain stability and security in our region," summing up Israel's change-averse foreign policy.

Israel cannot influence the upheavals in the Arab world, but it must not settle for expressions of concern voiced by anonymous security sources or by seeking refuge behind the worn barricades of "there's no partner for dialogue" and "we always said you can't trust the Arabs." The state would do better to look beyond them and to seek out the hidden opportunity in the disruption of the old regional order. If Netanyahu plays his cards right, he could leverage the fall of neighbouring regimes into a significant improvement in Israel's relations with the United States.

After a few days of indecision, U.S. President Barack Obama rallied to the side of the protesters and publicly distanced himself from Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Faithful to his ideology, Obama abandoned America's protégé for vague promises of democracy, but his considerations were also practical: he presumably judged that Mubarak's regime is a lost cause and that it's better to be on the winning side. Obama's position must worry the leaders of Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states, which fear similar uprisings at home and now recognize that the Americans will throw them under the bus.

Obama wants to be popular among the citizens of Arab states at the expense of their leaders, as he tried to do in his Cairo speech some 18 months ago. He is betting that the new regimes will be grateful and will continue to rely on Washington for diplomatic and military support. But he is taking a risk: what if the revolution doesn't stop at the moderate interim stage and keeps going till it reaches Muslim extremism? And what will the United States do in the interim phase, when the Middle East is sunk in uncertainty?

CJPAC Heads West

VANCOUVER — The Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) has opened a new Western Canada office and hired a western regional director, the organization announced. Eleanor Johnston, who comes to CJPAC after serving as senior special assistant to federal cabinet minister Peter Kent, began work last week by meeting with community leaders and running programs for students. She was then scheduled to head to Edmonton, where she will be establishing a permanent office, before travelling to Calgary and Winnipeg for additional meetings.

Stelmach Honoured

CALGARY — Alberta Premier Ed Stelmach was honoured as man of the year by B'nai Brith Calgary Lodge No. 18 on the day he announced he would be stepping down at the end of the current legislative session. The award, for Stelmach's 25 years of public service, was given at the chapter's annual Gentleman's Dinner, held last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Channel Approved

OTTAWA — The CRTC announced last week that it has approved the channel Jewish Life Television for digital distribution to cable and satellite TV providers. The broadcast regulator received a request to license the channel from Ethnic Channels Group Ltd., a multi-ethnic, third-language broadcaster that currently offers 12 such channels, including the Israeli Network, a 24-hour-a-day Hebrew channel featuring the best of Israeli TV.

WORLD

Honour Defended

LONDON — British author Ian McEwan defended his decision to accept Israel's Jerusalem Prize. McEwan wrote in the Guardian Jan. 26 that he has concerns "about Israel and the situation of the Palestinians, which is worse than ever." But he said he would go to Jerusalem to accept Israel's highest literary honour for foreign writers. "I'm for finding out for myself, and for dialogue, engagement, and looking for ways in which literature, especially fiction... can reach across political divides," he wrote. McEwan, author of Amsterdam and Atonement, was responding to a Guardian letter two days earlier by the group British Writers in Support of Palestine, which backs a cultural and economic boycott of Israel. In defending his decision, he invoked previous recipients of the prize – such as Milan Kundera, Susan Sontag and Arthur Miller – which is given biennially to an author whose works exemplify "freedom of the individual in society."

Court Lets Rahm Run

CHICAGO — The Illinois Supreme Court ruled that Rahm Emanuel can run for Chicago mayor.

Rahm Emanuel

The Jan. 27 ruling overturned a state appellate court decision last week that his name be removed from the ballot because he had not lived in the city for a year before the election, as stipulated by the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners. That ruling was "without any foundation in Illinois law," the Supreme Court decision said.

Emanuel spent the last two years living in Washington, D.C., serving as U.S. President Barack Obama's chief of staff. The ballots are already being printed for the Feb. 22 election. Early voting starts Jan. 31.

A former congressman who also worked in the Clinton White House, Emanuel argued he was exempt under a "national service" exception, and that he maintained ownership of his Chicago home. Two lower bodies, the Board of Election Commissioners and a Cook County court, ruled in his favour. Emanuel, whose father is Israeli, leads in the polls.

Film Delayed

BERLIN — An anti-Israel Turkish movie filmed in part on the flotilla ship Mavi Marmara didn't open in Germany as scheduled. Germany's film-ratings agency said it wouldn't allow Valley of the Wolves-Palestine to open Jan. 27 because it hadn't had time to review it. The film was to open on International Holocaust Day and in some 100 countries Jan. 28. The third film in a series, it follows a fictitious hit squad that goes to Israel to kill the planners of last May's Marmara operation.

Google, Yad Vashem team up on photos

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Yad Vashem and Internet giant Google last week launched a high-tech partnership that allows Google surfers to access the Holocaust authority's massive photo database.

In less than a week, Yad Vashem recorded hundreds of thousands of discrete visits to its photo archive as well as tens of thousands of visitors comments, said Avner Shalev, chair of the Jerusalem-based institution.

The project has proven an "overwhelming" success, Shalev said in a telephone interview. "It gives us greater accessibility around the world."

Launched on Jan. 27, International Holocaust Remembrance Day, the program allows web surfers to enter a name "and if there's a photo that names your relative, it takes you to the Yad Vashem archives," Shalev said.

The Google technology also employs optical character recognition, which scans for written text on the photo, increasing the chances of locating relevant pictures.

"This for us is huge progress forward," Shalev said. It makes more photos accessible, and the interactive tool included in the search engine allows people to correct or add to Yad Vashem's records about the individuals in the pictures.

Canadian Betty Eisenstadt tested the technology earlier this week. Six years ago, she donated to Yad Vashem family photos, including one of her parents, Dov and Rachel (Bak). She found the family picture and "is pleased to find out memories of her family will be kept forever," said Yaron Ashkenazi, executive director of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

The Canadian Society plans to ask its young leadership division to encourage Canadians to collect Holocaust-era photos to donate to Yad Vashem as a way of preserving their memories, he added.

"As of today, 130,000 photos from Yad Vashem's archive will be viewable in full resolution online. This is a first step toward bringing the vast Yad Vashem archive online over time," Ashkenazi said.

"We're focused on finding new and innovative ways to make the enormous amount of data in our archives accessible and searchable to a global audience," Shalev said. "Google is an integral partner in our mission, as they help us to reach new audiences, including young people around the world, enabling them to be active in the discussion about the Holocaust."

Rachel Elsenstadt, 1938

"We're privileged to be able to work with the world's foremost Holocaust archive on this project," said Yossi Matias, director of Google's research and development centre in Israel. "For some time, Google has been working to bring the world's historical and cultural heritage online. The Internet offers a great opportunity to preserve and share important materials stored in archives."

With the success of the program, Yad Vashem is looking to take a next step: "We will continue to upload other parts of our archive, step by step, that will give priority to testimonies. We have tens of thousands of testimonies," Shalev said.

For the past two years, in co-operation with Google, Yad Vashem has offered some of these audio-visual survivor statements in English, Russian, Hebrew and German on YouTube. About a week ago, the centre added a Farsi (Persian)-language version of testimonies that attracted more than 30,000 visitors.

Yad Vashem's survivor testimonies are available at www.youtube.com/yadvashem.

The photographic collection is visible at http://collections.yadvashem.org/photosarchive.

Murder unsolved

After he was appointed chief of the Imperial General Staff in Great Britain in 1946, Field Marshall Viscount Bernard Montgomery of Alamein made known his unambiguous wishes to crush the Jewish resistance in Palestine.

British historian David Cesarani tells us precisely what Viscount Montgomery had in mind (see From the Editor's Desk, Jan. 27).

"All ranks had to realize now that the Jews have flung the gauntlet in our face, they must be utterly and completely defeated and their illegal organizations smashed forever."

But Montgomery's directive is only a small part of the first chapter of Cesarani's powerful book Major Farran's Hat: Murder, Scandal and Britain's War Against Jewish Terrorism 1945-1948 (Vintage Books). It is part of the stage-setting for the "murder" and the "scandal" that comprise the central theme of his work.

From the editor's desk...

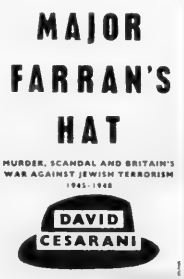
After World War II, the call to establish a free, independent, sovereign homeland for the Jewish People in Palestine became more urgent and more strident. After World War II, however, to the shock and disbelief of most of the free world, Britain altered its policy toward a national home for the Jews in Palestine, effectively giving the Arabs of the Middle East a veto on its establishment.

Not surprisingly, this Realpolitik but cruel shift in British policy caused the yishuv – the Jews who then lived in Palestine – to react with anger. As a further result, the organized Jewish fighting groups in Palestine – the Haganah, Etzel and Lehi (the Stern Gang) – took up arms with greater desperation, frenzy and violence. The British occupying forces in Palestine were attacked with increasing ferocity. This led to more extreme measures on the part of the British, which in turn led to angrier reprisals by the Jewish groups. And thus the cycle was looped in fury, flames and blood.

"At 6:30 on the evening of Tuesday, May 6, 1947, Alexander Rubowitz left his home at 22 David Yelling St. in Mea Shearim... Although he was only 16 years old, Alexander was setting out on a mission for the Lohamei HaHerut b'Yisrael (The Fighters for the Freedom of Israel – Lehi)." His mission was to distribute anti-British posters.

The lad never completed his mission. He was abducted by three men, thrown into a car and taken somewhere into the desert east of Jerusalem toward Jericho, probably around Wadi Kelt. He was interrogated, tortured, killed and his body brutalized.

A hat belonging to one of the abductors was left behind at the scene of the kidnapping. Cesarani tells us that it belonged to Maj. Roy Alexander Farran, a decorated commando, hero and soldier of World War II. Along with other commandos and experts in unconventional warfare, Farran was sent to Palestine at the height of the bloody insurrection against British rule there to seek out, fight and thwart the Jewish underground.



In painstaking detail, Cesarani recreates the events of the murder of Rubowitz and the apprehension, trial and acquittal of Farran for that murder.

Along the way, of course, he describes and analyzes Britain's colonial policies in Palestine and especially its misguided and ultimately disastrous decision to introduce stealth, commando, thuggish warfare against the Jews of Palestine. "The scandal that erupted around [this decision] shook the British Mandate to its foundations and helped erode whatever legitimacy remained for British rule," Cesarani writes.

Whatever happened to Farran?

He immigrated to Canada in 1950, settled in Calgary and died in 2006.

The following was part of the obituary that appeared in the June 13, 2006, edition of the Calgary Herald.

"With bagpipe music filling the air, a military guard led a procession sprawling over 10 blocks, from the church to the cemetery, where pallbearers carried former Maj. Roy Alexander Farran to his final resting place...

"Close to 1,000 people – including military representatives from France, Italy and Britain – and 120 Canadian soldiers attended the service... that was every bit as grand as the man himself.

"A decorated war hero, an accomplished newspaperman and a memorable politician, Alberta's former solicitor general was remembered by many as a remarkable man of audacious spirit and great humour."

To this day, no-one knows where Rubowitz is buried, if indeed he was buried, anywhere, in the barren, rock-strewn hills between Jerusalem and Jericho. Only a blue plaque marks the spot in Jerusalem where the 16-year-old boy was abducted 64 years ago and where Farran lost his hat.

Shoah education strengthened Cdn. Jewry: prof

Michael Isenberg
Special to The CJN

If there hadn't been a push to promote Holocaust education in the 1970s and 1980s, Canada's Jewish communities wouldn't be as robust as they are today, historian Frank Bialystok told an audience last week on International Holocaust Remembrance Day.

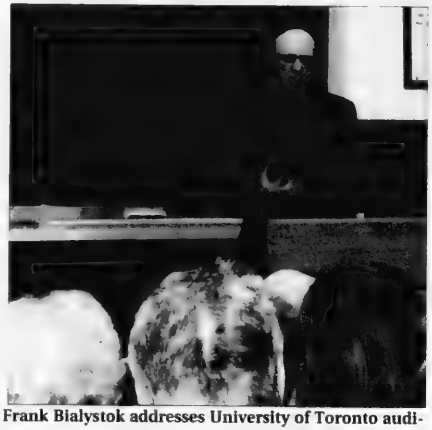
Speaking at the University of Toronto to some 50 people Jan. 27 – the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz – Bialystok's lecture focused on his book, Delayed Impact: The Holocaust and the Canadian Jewish Community, which won the Tannenbaum Prize in Canadian Jewish History in 2000.

Bialystok, a professor of European and modern Jewish history said Canadian Jews' success from the 1940s to the 1960s made it difficult for survivors and other Jewish immigrants to fully comprehend the impact of the Holocaust.

"There was a time of immediate transition for Jewish life in Canada. Everything was gone in a flash. Whatever it was that provided vibrancy in immigrant Jewish communities was gone," said Bialystok, whose talk was presented by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre and U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies.

"There was a fast transition to life in the suburbs, consumerism... [North American values] were important for Jews at the time. Yiddish was their first language, but it was not the language they spoke with each other. That was English. Yiddish was gone."

He added that the need to make a living, a desire to adapt to their new home, and the lack of post-Holocaust discussion made the assimilation of North American Jewry easier.



Frank Bialystok addresses University of Toronto audience.

"Eventually we saw a transition from identifying ourselves as immigrants to [identifying as] Canadians. There was a Jewish emptiness. North American Jewry had lost its way."

Ironically, Bialystok said that an increase in antisemitism towards the end of the 1960s caused a reawakening of Jewish consciousness. But it wasn't until 1985 that Canadian Jews began to advocate for Holocaust education in their own and other communities.

Key events that year inspired this push, including the trial of neo-Nazi Holocaust denier Ernst Zündel and former Canadian prime minister Brian Mulroney's establishment of the Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals in Canada.

As well, the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the concentration camps, along with the Jewish community's sudden yearning to document testimonies from survivors so that the atrocities are never forgotten, also pushed people to action.

Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff released a statement on International Holocaust Remembrance Day that said action is the key to maintaining a tolerant society.

"We must remain vigilant in our opposition to the antisemitism which continues to this day and hold fast to our commitment to human rights, our fundamental belief in the sanctity of religious freedoms, and the values of mutual respect and tolerance all Canadians share."

Thornhill MP and Environment Minister Peter Kent also released a statement that said it's important to keep Holocaust education alive. "While remembrance is important, now more than ever, so too is vigilance. 'Never again' must be more than a sentiment – it must be a call to action.

"As civilized, peace-loving people, we have a duty to stand in solidarity with our Jewish brothers and sisters in Canada and around the world. We must confront those who spew antisemitism from the pulpit and the political podium, confound those who wish to perpetrate another Holocaust and support the Jewish people so that they are never, ever again left to stand alone."

Local Israeli communities undergoing change

Past six years characterized by transformation, says Federation CEO

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

Attempts to establish relationships between Israelis abroad and the larger Jewish community have had some success in several cities in recent years, speakers at the recent conference of the World Council of Israelis Abroad agreed.

This is true whether the Israeli community is relatively large, comprising tens of thousands as it does in Toronto, or small, as it is in San Diego, Calif., and Melbourne, Australia, conference participants heard Jan. 19 at Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

"The past six years in Toronto are characterized by transformation between the Jewish community and the Israeli community. It sounds funny..., but the Israeli-Canadian has been born," Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said.

"We learned a lot from the Israelis, probably more than they have learned from us. We are an immigrant society, [but] for some reason, we were insensitive to the immigration experience of the Israelis to Toronto," he said.

"In 2005, a new wave of Israeli immigration to Toronto began. [Because of] the intifadah, high-tech, real estate options and other reasons, the Israelis fell in love with the multicultural atmosphere of the place."

It has been a challenge for the Israeli community to engage with the wider Jewish community, Sokolsky said.

"Mistakes have been made, but patience, understanding and leadership responsibility brought about a change. Wonderful things are happening such as the Kachol-Lavan [Hebrew] school and the Tzofim (Israeli Scouts). We see Canadian families sending their kids there.

"The Israeli community is growing... in areas north of the city. We see an Israeli heart pounding in the city, and we can feel the Israeli pride here," he added.

The community here has another job to do, as well, he said. "The Israelis abroad have a key role in building a bridge between Diaspora Jewry and the State of Israel."

Israeli representatives from both sides of the Pacific Ocean also talked about building bridges between the Israeli community and the local Jewish community in their cities.

Menachem Kohen, head of the Israeli Centre in Melbourne, which was established in 1995, spoke about how his centre has worked to integrate the Israelis into the greater Jewish community.

"This is an opportunity to change history," Kohen said. "We succeeded in establishing an Israeli community in Melbourne. The beginning was hard and there were many issues to fight for."

One of the first activities of the centre was to introduce the first-ever Yom Hazikaron commemoration ceremony in Melbourne, marking the memory of those who had been killed in Israel's wars and military campaigns as well as victims of terrorist attacks.

"It is an important day and a part of our identity, and about 1,000 participants now [attend] the ceremony every year," he said.

Kohen also proposed the idea of establishing an international organization of Israelis abroad. "It is about time that we will feel as equals among equals," he said.

Jennie Star, representing the San Diego Israeli Cultural Center, spoke about the difficulties of preserving a tiny community.

"The San Diego Israeli community is very small, and that is a big challenge," she said. "Our community has many Israeli elements, such as the local newspaper, day schools, social events, film club, coffee and Hebrew café, Israeli culture events and more.

"We hope to have the Tzofim in the near future as it is important for the future of the young generation," Star added.

The conference, the first to bring together Israelis from around the world, was organized and sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Jewish Agency for Israel, Mishelanu Organization for Israelis Abroad and the Israeli Ministry of Diaspora Affairs.

Egyptian quake, worldwide tremors

Among the opening words of the Arab Human Development Report of 2009, the fifth volume of the United Nations Development Programme, Regional Bureau for Arab States, is the following statement: "Seven years after the publication of the first Arab Human Development Report, the region's fault lines as traced in that analysis may have deepened." In other words, according to the most significant markers measuring human progress – economic, political, environmental, social and personal – the vast masses of the Arab world have actually fallen further behind than their lowly state of seven years prior.

Some of those Arab masses, it is now entirely apparent, will no longer passively accept their blighted conditions.

The civic conflagration that began some weeks ago in Tunisia has now spread to Egypt. After the first throngs of demonstrators took to the streets of Cairo and Alexandria, analysts and experts were quick to differentiate Egypt from Tunisia, suggesting that the shouting and marching even from the impressively large Egyptian numbers was merely the letting off of steam rather than a precursor to regime overthrow. Seven days later, when these words were written, the demonstrations had evolved into riots and the riots into looting, arson, chaos and mayhem. Some 100 people have been killed on the upheaving streets of Egypt. Hosni Mubarak's 30-year term as president remains very much in doubt.

To demonstrate his willingness to reform, Mubarak appointed an entirely new cabinet and his security chief, Omar Suleiman, as vice-president. Egyptians, however, seemed to have been unimpressed with Mubarak's gesture toward change. The rioting has continued unabated.

Arab societies are not much used to the peaceful transfer of governmental power. There are very few precedents to look to for guidance. No one yet knows where the mace of parliamentary authority will finally point in Egypt. Gamal Nasser, a spokesperson for the radical, though popular, Islamic Brotherhood, said on the weekend that his group was in talks with Mohammed ElBaradei, the Nobel laureate and former head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to form a national unity government without involvement of any kind by Mubarak or his party.

The events unfolding in Egypt – indeed thus far in the Arab world – are a massive geopolitical earthquake. The familiar political Mideast terrain is shifting. Tremors will be felt around the world, if first in Israel. Let us hope and be on guard that the aftershocks do not lead to greater instability, danger and insecurity in the region. There is indeed, cause to worry.

Forces chaplain found it tough to leave

I read with great interest your article "Rabbis at home in the Canadian Forces" (Jan. 6) and would like to extend my appreciation for your interest in covering the important topic of chaplaincy in the Canadian Forces.

As mentioned, I was the first Jewish chaplain to be sworn in since World War II. I am proud of my service and feel tremendously honoured to have been given the opportunity to have served my country and to have made a significant contribution to the military.

The article mentioned that "the Forces say Rabbi Mendelsohn has been 'released' from duty and did not elaborate." I do not understand why the word "released" was in quotations and the phrasing, I believe, leaves a negative connotation. I would like to clarify that I voluntarily requested a release from the Reserves, due to my growing civilian responsibilities.

The military was like a family for me. The men and women in uniform who served with me were of outstanding character and made a lasting impression. The experience was unique, and it was tough to leave. I hope that one day in the future, when my civilian schedule is more flexible, to once again be able to put on the uniform and proudly serve. To read more about my military experience, please visit www.chabadcentrepointe.com/military.

Not the Jewish way

I am frankly astounded that any group that calls itself "Jewish" would support a group like the English Defence League (Rally for anti-Islamist group draws protesters," Jan. 20). And that is why I am proud of Canadian Jewish Congress for standing firm against the Jewish Defence League's decision to have a rally on behalf of the English Defence League (EDL). Only a little research will demonstrate the history of the EDL, a group made up of soccer hooligans condemned by every Jewish organization in the United Kingdom, including the British Jewish Defence League (JDL). I was beginning to believe that the Canadian JDL was trying to become less radical and more mainstream. This latest initiative on their part only confirms for me that the JDL remains very much on the fringe of our community. Embracing the EDL is not the Jewish way.

No friend of ours

I wish to commend Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress for speaking out against the union of the Jewish Defence League (JDL) and the U.K.-based English Defence League (Rally for anti-Islamist group draws protesters," Jan. 20). While I understand the necessity to confront Islamic extremists, it is troubling that the JDL would choose to make common cause with the many racists who populate the English Defence League (EDL), which seems to lump all Muslims together as the threat facing the West. It was not so long ago that the same thing was said about the Jews. The EDL is no friend of ours.

Nazi knife on sale at market

While I was shopping recently at the Downsview Park Merchants Market, located in Downsview Park in Toronto, a Canadian national park, I passed by a glass showcase. Displayed in this case was a collection of military-style (Rambo) knives. Prominently displayed was a knife bearing a swastika and, on the handle, engraved in German, was what I believe to be the motto of the Nazi SS.

Being a child of Holocaust survivors, needless to say, I was quite disturbed by the fact that such a knife was not only on display, but was available for sale. Downsview Park is situated in the middle of the electoral district of York Centre, a riding that is home to one of the largest Jewish communities in Canada. Many of the residents are Holocaust survivors or, like me, children of those survivors. This is not only an affront to us alone but to all of those who suffered under the Nazi occupation of Europe.

I know that the display and sale of this item is legal in Canada. I do, however, feel that such a display is morally reprehensible. In Germany, such a knife would be confiscated and the seller arrested, and perhaps imprisoned. But that is modern-day Germany.

We would not allow a swastika flag to be flown from a flagpole on our property. Why would we allow this disgusting display on our property?

Settlements issue distorts Geneva and Oslo

Alan Baker
Special to The CJN

Palestinian representatives at the United Nations recently presented a draft resolution to the Security Council in which they seek to declare that Israeli settlements are "illegal and constitute a major obstacle to the achievement of peace." This claim is not new, and the legality of Israel's settlements have for years dominated the attention of the international community. This has been evident in countless reports of different UN bodies, rapporteurs, and resolutions, as well as in political declarations and statements by governments and leaders. In varying degrees, they consider Israel's settlements to be in violation of international law, specifically Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, of August 12, 1949.

But apart from the almost standardized, oft-repeated, and commonly accepted clichés as to the "illegality of Israel's settlements," or the "flagrant violation" of the Geneva Convention, repeated even by the International Court of Justice, there has been little genuine attempt to elaborate and consider the substantive legal reasoning behind this view. Yet there are a number of very relevant factors that inevitably must be considered when making such a serious accusation against Israel.

What does Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention say?

Immediately after World War II, the need arose to draft an international convention to protect civilians in times of armed conflict in light of the massive numbers of civilians forced to leave their homes during the war, and the glaring lack of effective protection for civilians under any of the then-valid conventions or treaties. In this context, the sixth paragraph of Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention states: "The occupying power shall not deport or transfer parts of its own civilian population into the territory it occupies."

The authoritative and official commentary by the governing body of the International Red Cross movement, the International Committee of the Red Cross, published in 1958 in order to assist "governments and armed forces...called upon to assume responsibility in applying the Geneva Conventions," clarifies this provision as follows: "It is intended to prevent a practice adopted during the Second World War by certain powers, which transferred portions of their own population to occupied territory for political and racial reasons or in order, as they claimed, to colonize those territories. Such transfers worsened the economic situation of the native population and endangered their separate existence as a race."

In other words, Article 49 relates to the forcible transfer of an occupying power's population into an occupied territory. Historically, more than 40 million people were subjected to forced migration, evacuation, displacement, and expulsion, including 15 million Germans, five million Soviet citizens, and millions of Poles, Ukrainians and Hungarians.

The vast numbers of people affected and the aims and purposes behind such a population movement speak for themselves. There is nothing to link such circumstances to Israel's settlement policy. The circumstances in which Article 49(6) of the Geneva Convention was drafted, and specifically the meaning attached by the International Committee of the Red Cross itself to that article, raise a serious question as to the relevance of linkage to, and reliance on, the article by the international community as the basis and criterion for determining Israel's settlements as illegal. One may further ask if this is not a misreading, misunderstanding, or even distortion of that article and its context.

Several prominent international jurists, such as Prof. Eugene V. Rostow, a former dean of Yale Law School and undersecretary of state; Morris Abram, a member of the U.S. staff at the Nuremburg Tribunal and later involved in the drafting of the Fourth Geneva Convention, and international lawyer Prof. Julius Stone, are on record stressing that the Geneva Convention was not designed to cover situations such as Israeli settlements in the occupied territories, but rather the forcible transfer, deportation or resettlement of large numbers of people.

Article 49(6) uses terminology that is indicative of governmental action in coercing its citizens to move. Yet Israel has not forcibly deported or mass-transferred its citizens into the territories. It has consistently maintained a policy enabling people to reside voluntarily on land that is not privately owned. Their continued presence is subject to the outcome of the negotiation process on the status of the territory, and without necessarily prejudicing that outcome.

In some cases, Israel has permitted its citizens who have for many years owned property or tracts of land in the territory, and who had been previously dispossessed and displaced by Jordan, to return to their own properties. This historical presence is totally unrelated to the context of, or claims regarding, the Geneva Convention.

Israel has never expressed any intention to colonize the territories, to confiscate land, or to displace the local population for political or racial reasons, nor to alter the demographic nature of the area.

The agreements signed with the Palestinian leadership has in fact placed the entire issue of the status of the territory, as well as Israel's settlements, on the negotiating table – a factor that proves the lack of any intention to colonize or displace. The fact that Israel chose unilaterally to dismantle its settlements and remove its citizens from the Gaza Strip in 2005 is further evidence of this.

The status of the territory, including the rights of the parties therein and the Israeli settlements, are the central negotiating issues between the two sides. In this context, and pursuant to its obligations in Article XXXI (7) of the Israeli-Palestinian Interim Agreement of 1993, Israel has not taken any step to alter the status of the territory, which is open for determination in permanent status negotiations. Israel's settlements do not alter the status of the territory.

Then-Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres, left, then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin discuss matters at the Erez Checkpoint in 1995. It was during this period that the Palestinians and the Israelis signed agreements for further negotiations under the Oslo accords.

The unique circumstances of the territory and the special nature of the Israeli-Palestinian relationship

The entirely unique situation, history and circumstances of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict regarding the territories, as well as the series of agreements and memoranda that have been signed between the Palestinian leadership and the government of Israel, have produced a special independent regime – a lex specialis – that governs all aspects of the relationship between them, including the settlements issue.

The settlements issue is one of the core issues to be negotiated in permanent status negotiations, and the Palestinian leadership has agreed and is committed to the fact that it does not exercise jurisdiction regarding such permanent status issues, settlements included, pending permanent status negotiations.

The special regime governing the relationship between Israel and the Palestinians is set out in the series of agreements and memoranda negotiated between 1993 and 1999 that are still valid. These documents cover all the central issues between them, including issues of governance, security, elections, jurisdiction, human rights, legal issues, and the like. In this framework, there is no specific provision either restricting planning, zoning and continued construction by either party, of towns and villages, or freezing such construction.

Furthermore, in the 1995 Interim Agreement, the two sides defined their respective powers and responsibilities in the areas they control. Israel's powers and responsibilities in Area C – which is under Israeli control and comprises most of the West Bank – include all aspects regarding its settlements, all this pending the outcome of permanent status negotiations. This division was accepted and agreed upon by the Palestinians, who cannot now invoke the Geneva Convention regime in order to bypass their acceptance of the interim agreement or their and the international community's acknowledgement of that agreement's relevance and continued validity.

Conclusion

The main proponent of the settlement issue over the years has been the Palestinian leadership, which has decided to isolate and raise the issue of settlements as an independent "cause célèbre". This, despite the fact that it's among the agreed-upon items to be negotiated in permanent status negotiations. Similarly, Israel had not obligated itself in any way to refrain from, halt or freeze construction in the settlements.

Furthermore, raising the settlement issue has succeeded in blocking any progress in the negotiating process, so much so that the Palestinian leadership is now holding any return to a negotiation mode as a hostage to a settlement freeze.

The international community is faced with ongoing and unceasing attempts by the Palestinian leadership to bypass the negotiating process and to directly lobby the international community, and to seek intervention by the UN Security Council in order to attain a more formalized, institutionalized and concerted opinion as to the illegality of Israel's settlements.

The international community cannot seriously ignore the factors set out above, as well as the implications that any such new resolution or decision might have on the already agreed-upon, delicate structure of the peace process.

Dangers to Israeli democracy

Several disturbing events have recently provided opportunity for public debate regarding the health of Israel's democracy.

A partial inventory of these incidents includes a recent Knesset vote to establish a parliamentary commission of inquiry into the source of funding for Israeli human rights organizations, a bill that would require new citizens to pledge an oath of allegiance to "a Jewish and democratic" State of Israel, and a shameful "halachic" ruling, signed by dozens of rabbis, forbidding the leasing of property to non-Jews.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Noting these events and others, a recent Time magazine headline characterized Israel as being on a "rightward lurch."

Is this an accurate representation of present-day Israel?

It's no secret that, politically, Israelis are becoming increasingly conservative. In the 2009 Knesset elections, 65 of the 120 seats were won by parties identifying with right-leaning policies, and according to recent polls, that lead is growing. A mid-January survey done for Ha'aretz gave the right 70 seats. Add to this the fact that 30 of the remaining seats would go to Tzipi Livni's centrist Kadima party, which has several ex-Likudniks, Livni included.

Of the 20 remaining seats, roughly 10 traditionally go to non-Zionist Arab members of Knesset. The remainder – one-twelfth of our parliament – would now go to Israel's classic left, remnants of the once-mighty Labor party and Meretz.

Of the recent events noted, the most troubling is the initiative to establish a parliamentary commission aimed at examining how human rights organizations are funded. It's the brainchild of Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman's Yisrael Beiteinu party and came on the heels of publication of the Goldstone commission report on Israel Defence Forces actions during the war in Gaza two years ago. The report revealed that Goldstone had received damning material from Israeli human rights organizations. Later, it also became known that some of these groups receive foreign funding.

Supporters of the parliamentary commission, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and most of his Likud faction, assert the need to investigate civil rights organizations' foreign financial support, because overseas groups and foreign governments are promoting their own anti-Israel agendas by funding Israeli human rights groups, which in turn have been accused of acting traitorously by providing Goldstone and others with evidence against the IDF and its soldiers.

Opponents, including four prominent members of Likud, led by minister without portfolio Benny Begin, former prime minister Menachem Begin's son, argue that it smacks of McCarthyism, that it's aimed at silencing groups opposed to the government's policies and actions, and that it's inflammatory. They add that if these groups acted illegally, they should be investigated by the police or other law enforcement agencies.

Actions aimed at intimidating people who think differently and limiting their freedom of expression are dangerous in any democracy. That appears to be at least part of the purpose of the commission of inquiry.

But lawmakers should remember there's more than one way to be a patriot and a Zionist. There's no absolute truth.

A distinction must, however, be made between support Israeli groups receive from foreign groups and individuals and support they receive from foreign governments. While Israeli groups should be allowed to receive funding from foreign donors – so long as both donors and beneficiaries are acting legally – it's diplomatically unacceptable for foreign governments to be meddling in Israel's internal affairs by funding organizations that promote agendas these governments believe are better for Israel and the region in general.

Does this qualification justify a parliamentary commission of inquiry? Absolutely not. Demagogic attacks on the character and patriotism of individuals who'll be investigated by the commission can already be heard. We got a taste of things to come a few months ago when the New Israel Fund was publicly dragged through the mud because it had allegedly backed organizations that provided Goldstone with some of his information.

Netanyahu, Lieberman and their political allies should not be resorting to base, populist mudslinging to further their own political agendas. Rather, the government and Knesset should draft legislation that would properly regulate foreign governments' financial contributions to Israeli organizations of all persuasions, be they left or right, secular or religious, Jewish, Christian or Muslim.

Not all is bleak. Although many of the current initiatives are distressing, the vociferous public debates about each of them – fuelled by a vibrant free press – contradict the notion that our body politic is in peril. Let's hope it stays that way.

Palestine papers and peace myths

The publication of hundreds of leaked documents from Palestinian officials regarding peace negotiations provides important insights into these critical issues, assuming that they are genuine.

The documents, mainly from the Palestinian Negotiation Support Unit, seem to show serious and detailed exchanges – and arguments – between Israeli and Palestinian Authority leaders, particularly on refugee claims and Jerusalem. But they also reflect a failure to reach agreement, suggesting that the conditions for "ripeness," meaning a readiness to take the most difficult steps necessary to end such bitter and long-standing conflicts, remain unfulfilled.

These summaries indicate that the main focus of dispute continues to be on what are called "core identity issues" – such as history, rights, and image – rather than on boundaries, territory, and even security. An end to the Palestinian refugee claims (invented after the 1948 war to maintain the conflict and supported by the UN and a large NGO lobby), and a clear public acknowledgement of Jewish history, particularly in Jerusalem, with the rights that follow, are essential to end the conflict. On both of these issues, the post-Arafat Palestinian leadership showed a willingness to negotiate, but would not agree to terms that Israelis could accept.

The issues that create the greatest amount of noise and emotion in the media, and in public campaigns, get much less attention on the inside, or so these documents indicate. Israeli settlements and the post-1967 "occupation," which are consistently painted by the self-proclaimed "peace camp" as the major (and sometimes only) obstacles to peace, are easily resolved through land swaps in the negotiations. If security, and the identity issues of refugee claims, historic responsibility, and Jerusalem could be resolved, the boundaries would be follow quickly and the settlement issue would disappear.

The reality, however, is far more complex than the simplistic journalistic formulae. For example, Palestinian negotiators, guided by PA President Mahmoud Abbas, demanded the entry of 100,000 refugees into Israel, while former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert offered a symbolic total of 5,000.

There was no indication that the Palestinians conceded that the Arab aggression in 1948 created this situation. This discussion would also need to take into account the rights of one million Jewish refugees who were evicted from their homes throughout the Middle East. In contrast to the Arabs, who used refugees as political pawns (in co-operation with the UN), the Jewish refugees were absorbed by Israel within a few years.

On Jerusalem, the Palestinian negotiators were apparently somewhat more realistic than in the past, agreeing to Israeli incorporation of neighbourhoods near the 1949 armistice line (the "green line") following the Jordanian military takeover. These areas include French Hill, Pisgat Ze'ev, Neve Ya'acov, Ramat Shlomo and Gilo. However, the Palestinians excluded Ma'aleh Adumim – clearly a non-starter for Israel. On the most difficult issue of the Temple Mount and Western Wall, the Palestinians reverted to the ambiguity of "creative solutions" and a joint Israel-Palestinian committee.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

But even these limited changes have been attacked by Arab critics as a betrayal of the Palestinian position. (Some analysts attribute the leaks to Hamas, as part of an effort to embarrass and undermine the Palestinian Authority.)

The bottom line is that no agreement was signed between Olmert and Abbas, and these documents don't tell us why. When the time came to close the deal, the Palestinian side didn't show up. There are many possible explanations, including the fact that in the largely closed and undemocratic Palestinian society, the leaders may not have had support for the long-delayed decisions.

In Israel, the costs, benefits and complexities of peace have been debated for more than 20 years, but this hasn't been the case in Palestinian society. The essential steps required for the historic compromises – particularly on refugee claims, Jerusalem, and the Jewish nation's right to sovereignty – are only now being discussed. And Palestinian and Arab rejectionists and ideologues are trying hard to slam the door on any change in order to preserve their power.

To avoid returning to the starting point and perpetual conflict, Palestinian leaders will need to show the courage to say in public what they reportedly told Israelis in private.

West Bank settlements affect peace talks

At the behest of the Palestinian Authority, Arab countries, led by Lebanon, recently submitted a draft resolution to the United Nations Security Council condemning Israel's settlements in the West Bank. Borrowing language from communiques issued by the Quartet – the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia – the resolution described the settlements as "illegal" under international law and said that they "constitute a major obstacle to the achievement of a just, lasting and comprehensive peace."

By all accounts, the resolution will likely not be passed due to the threat of a U.S. veto. Washington remains steadfastly opposed to the settlements in principle and practice, but, like Israel, believes that this issue should be resolved in direct talks between Israel and the PA, which broke down last September, only three weeks after resuming.

The reason for the collapse was two-fold. When the Israeli government refused to renew its 10-month partial settlement freeze in the West Bank, the PA, backed by the Arab League, suspended its participation in negotiations, saying it would not return unless Israel froze all construction.

The PA subsequently upped the ante, demanding that the freeze should also apply to eastern Jerusalem, which is claimed by the Palestinians

For the PA, the UN resolution, stillborn though it may be at present, serves several overlapping purposes. It challenges the Obama administration to restart peace talks on Palestinian terms, enables PA President Mahmoud Abbas to save face after committing himself to a diplomatic solution, and sets the stage for a wider debate on the protracted Arab-Israeli conflict.

As per Arab strategy, the resolution is acutely embarrassing to the United States, since it places the Americans in an uncomfortable position – considering vetoing a resolution that faithfully reflects the policy of President Barack Obama.

Supported by almost 120 co-sponsors, it underscores Israel's isolation. Not a single country, major or minor, supports Israel's policy of building new and expanding existing settlements.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has claimed that settlement activity "has no real effect on the map of a possible [peace] agreement."

In fact, however, the settlements have already had a negative impact. They were a bane of the Oslo peace process, scuttled talks with the Palestinians in 2010, constituted a deal-breaker in negotiations in 2008, when Ehud Olmert was prime minister, and may yet jeopardize the notion of a two-state solution, which Netanyahu – the leader of a right-wing government – finally endorsed in 2009 under intense U.S. pressure.

The controversial settlement project is an outcome of Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Construction began within three months of Israel's seizure of the West Bank, which was allotted to a Palestinian state under the 1947 UN Palestine partition plan.

To religious Israeli Jews, the West Bank, comprising the biblical areas of Judea and Samaria, was regarded in messianic terms. To secular nationalists, the West Bank was seen as a defensive shield against an Iraqi invasion from the east and as an important source of water in an arid region.

To both parties, and to the Israeli government, settlements would block the emergence of a Palestinian state.

From the postwar period until Likud swept into office in 1977, the ruling Labor party allowed the first of about 30 settlements to be built in generally thinly Arab-populated parts of the West Bank.

Settlements were established in the Jordan Valley, near the shore of the Dead Sea, in the mountain ranges and in greater Jerusalem. New roads connected the settlements to each other and to Israel. The pre-1967 Green Line was gradually erased from Israeli maps and textbooks.

Israelis were encouraged to settle in the West Bank, less than one per cent of whose land was owned by Jews prior to the first Arab-Israeli war in1948, through a web of benefits, subsidies and incentives in housing, education, transportation and the like. Some Jews went to the West Bank for ideological and religious reasons, while still others were motivated by the relatively low cost of real estate and the high quality of life. Whatever factors brought them there, Jews in the West Bank were subjected to Israeli law.

Ariel, one of Israel's largest settlements in the West Bank

The defence minister of the day, Moshe Dayan, sought to minimize Israel's presence by creating what he deemed to be a benign or "invisible" occupation. He did so by granting the Palestinians a measure of self-rule and, through the Open Bridges policy, access to markets in neighbouring Jordan (which occupied the West Bank in the inter-war years between 1949 and 1967). Apart from annexing land from a cluster of villages surrounding eastern Jerusalem, Israel did not annex an inch of the West Bank.

Though Israel's military government used coercive tactics such as curfews, deportations and home demolitions to control the West Bank, Israel offered Palestinian farmers loans and technical assistance and let labourers into Israel. Since the West Bank was a key market for Israeli exporters, Israel discouraged the development of an independent Palestinian economy based on industry.

After 1967, Israel crushed a Palestinian guerrilla war in the West Bank, killing about 650 Palestinians in the first two decades of the occupation. Many more Palestinians were killed in the first and second uprisings in 1987 and 2000, which respectively claimed the lives of some 400 and 1,000 Israelis.

The right-wing Likud government, headed by Menachem Begin, stepped up the pace of construction. Under the supervision of one of his ministers, Ariel Sharon, Israel built dozens of settlements in crowded Palestinian areas. According to Israel's ministry of interior, the number of settlements shot up from 31 in 1977 to 76 in 1983.

The formation of a national unity government in 1984, enabling Likud and Labor to share power, was a windfall for settlement activists. By the early 1990s, the West Bank was dotted with 121 settlements. Yitzhak Rabin, the prime minister from 1992 to 1995, slowed down construction to an extent, but in the Oslo era, the settler population in the West Bank practically tripled.

During Sharon's reign as prime minister from 2001 to 2005, he reached understandings with the United States that obliged Israel to refrain from building new settlements or expanding old ones beyond construction lines. In 2009, Netanyahu promised he would neither build new settlements nor expropriate additional land for existing ones. But he insisted that settlers had a right to build in established settlements.

Today, more than 300,000 Israelis live in 121 settlements and about 100 unauthorized outposts in the West Bank. A further 200,000 or so Israeli Jews reside in 12 neighbourhoods in the eastern half of Jerusalem.

Since the expiry of the settlement moratorium and the withdrawal of the PA from peace talks more than four months ago, there has been a Jewish building boom in the West Bank.

The problem posed by settlements, therefore, festers.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Bringing God's presence to the world

Rabbi Yonah Berman

"HaShem is here, HaShem is there, HaShem is truly everywhere; Up, up, down, down, right,left and all around – that's where He can be found."

Generations of children have grown up on these lyrics, sung by Uncle Moishy and the Mitzvah Men, reflecting on the Jewish belief in an omnipresent God, who can be found in every place, at every time.

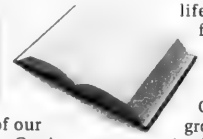
This principle leads us to question this week's Torah portion, where God tells Moses: "The Children of Israel] shall make Me a sanctuary [the Tabernacle] that I shall dwell amongst them." Which one is it? Is God always among us, or can God only be present when we create special sanctuary?

In order to consider a possible answer, let us travel back to the very beginning of Genesis and the creation of humankind. Recall that Adam and Eve were created, uniquely, in the image of God – "b'tzelem Elokim" (1:27). The commentators make all sorts of suggestions in trying to understand what it means to be created in the image of a God who is without physical form. Does it mean that we have free will? Does it mean that we can speak?

What is clear is that only humans are created in this way, and that this characteristic carries with it unique responsibilities for proper behaviour.

Rabbi Yitzchak Luria (the Ari) advanced the idea of tzimtzum, which states that in order for the infinite God to create space for the world, God had to "pull back," making room for Creation to come into existence. It appears that God decided to be less present in the world so that we creations have the opportunity to live our lives.

Rabbinic Reflections



Perhaps the lesson of our Torah portion is that since Ceation, God had to "pull back" in order to allow us to exist freely and independently. By constructing the desert Tabernacle at the centre of the Israelite camp, our ancestors created a space where God's presence could exist within humanity.

This understanding has deep and far-reaching ramifications. We learn that we are responsible to bring God's presence back into the world. We accomplish this incredible task through our actions: Every time we act kindly toward another person, make Kiddush on Shabbat or perform any other mitzvah, we bring God's presence a little closer. Our deeds can be amazingly powerful when we use them the right way.

The command to donate materials to build the Tabernacle was given to the entire nation of Israel. We are reminded that Judaism is not about being a mere spectator. Our faith requires every adherent to take part in the commandments of Jewish life. No one is exempt from Shabbat or prayer or kashrut or acting justly toward other people. Bringing God into the world is a group effort, and no one is allowed to sit out the game on the bench.

As we read about the Tabernacle, let us realize the tremendous opportunity given to us. Through our actions, we bring God's presence to the world, here, there and everywhere.

Rabbi Yonah Berman is the associate rabbi at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal.

Jewish tradition and ecology

Two thousand years ago, a talmudic sage had an experience that has much to teach us about our polluted environment. One day he noticed a farmer who was clearing his land of stones and throwing them unconcernedly onto a nearby road. He asked the farmer, "Why are you throwing stones from property which is not yours onto property that is yours?"

The perplexed farmer continued his work. Some years passed and the farm was sold, and one day coming down the road, the farmer stumbled over a stone and was injured. Disabled and contrite, he admitted that the rabbi was right. "I did throw stones from land which was not mine onto land that was," he said.

So in our day, the housewife pollutes the streams with detergent, and it's her own son who cannot swim in their waters. The factory owner empties his chemicals into the river, and the fish his children catch are poisoned. The city dumps it sewage and ruins its recreational areas. When we pollute, we pollute our own environment.

In his recent book, The Legacy (actually an extension of a lecture), David Suzuki maintains that we are tearing apart the intricate web of life that is the source of our most fundamental needs by driving an estimated 50,000 species to extinction every year. "It is humbling to realize that if our species were to go extinct overnight, biodiversity would rebound around the planet," he writes. "In contrast, the loss of an insect group such as all ants would result in catastrophic collapse of terrestrial ecosystems."

The Torah declares, "The Earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof." And that man must show reverence for that earth and all its inhabitants. With admirable prescience, the Bible commands that a besieging army must not destroy fruit trees. "Is a tree a man," it asks, "that you should make war upon it?"

The mishnah has a variety of regulations concerning the environment. A threshing floor, for example, was not permitted within a given distance from an inhabited place because the chaff and dust that resulted from the threshing process made for problems. A tannery, with its pervasive odours, was forbidden within city limits. No kilns were allowed in Jerusalem because their smoke-blackened buildings, and even more importantly dung hills and trash heaps, were not permitted to accumulate. Every soldier was to be equipped with a spade to dig his own latrine outside of his camp.

Suzuki is certain that our great crisis of climate change demands a radical new approach. He asserts that we must act in the best tradition of our species, which has been to use foresight based on our knowledge and experience. And today we have the amplified ability to look ahead with scientists armed with super computers and global telecommunications.

Some years ago, a major publication asked a number of historians and social scientists to define the national purpose of North America. They answered that there was no such national purpose except in times of war. Today, doesn't environmental concern and control offer a national purpose?

Hamas reaffirms its genocidal ideology

My View

By Lawrence Hart

For the naive and unenlightened, and many a postmodernist academic, political bureaucrat or media commentator, Hamas' victory in the Gaza elections of 2005 was sufficient to persuade them that democracy had suddenly broken out in that troubled neighbourhood and that, consequently, any new Hamas leadership deserved legitimacy and respect.

And despite the all-too-predictable reality that the democratization of the Islamic Resistance Movement – Hamas – was never on the cards, nor could it or would it be, there are still pundits in the international community – some of whom hold high political office – who remain obstinately wed to the fantasy that negotiating with Hamas is the only way forward for peace in the Middle East. That Canada, the United States, and the European Union list Hamas as a terrorist organization has had little apparent impact on such apologists. Instead, it seems to have emboldened them.

There are very good reasons why talking to Hamas is futile. Any inkling of moderation, in word or deed, since the movement's founding in 1988, would undoubtedly have opened opportunities for engagement but, sadly, none has been evident. Author Andrew Bostom, writing in the American Thinker (January 2009), reminds us that Hamas' foundational covenant calls for a Muslim genocide of the Jews. This rallying cry has remained central to Hamas ideology ever since.

And in a recent bulletin of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, senior researcher, Jonathan Halevi, gives further examples of the ominous underpinnings of Hamas beliefs. He notes that "there is no evidence of a new pragmatism among the Hamas leadership, but only greater indications of a much harder line, which is expressed by its adoption of expressions of genocidal intent in its war against Israel and the Jewish people."

By way of illustration, and to emphasize that such murderous ideation is both current and deliberate, Halevi draws attention to a December 2010 Hamas booklet titled The Path of Glory, which celebrates the movement's 23rd anniversary. Included in this publication are messages from two of Hamas' senior military commanders, Mohammed Def and Ahmed al-Jaabari. Def is on record as threatening that "you [meaning Israelis] are going on the path to extinction and Palestine will remain ours including Al-Quds [Jerusalem], Al-Aqsa [Mosque], its towns and villages from the [Mediterranean] Sea to the [Jordan] River, from its north to its south. You have no right to even an inch of it."

In echoing Def's call for conquest, Al-Jaabari warned that "as long as the Zionists occupy our lands, only death or exile awaits them."

Such venomous outbursts by Hamas leaders are not especially surprising. They're merely more of the same along a continuum of intimidation and manipulation that have defined the Islamic Resistance Movement since its establishment. What they reflect is a mindset that is uncompromising, fixated and irredeemably chained to a philosophy that is demonizing and annihilationist.

When an enemy's raison d'être calls openly and implacably for your extermination, there seems to be little to discuss. What really requires explanation is the pathology of those who, knowing full well what Hamas is and what its objectives are, nonetheless persist in pressuring Israel to begin talking to its envoys.

Bagel cuisine and culture, Pt. 2

Jewish & Digital

By Mark Mietkiewicz

Just think of a bagel as a warm, chewy halo /The angels gave us to eat. /It will fill you with passion, /It will fill you with joy, / Not to mention two pounds of wheat.

[http://bit.ly/bagels10]

OK, maybe not two pounds of wheat, but you have to know what ingredients to use in your bagel if you want to create a mouth-watering delight.

Check out the Jewish-food Bagel Archives, where you will find 29 varieties. [http://bit.ly/bagels11] From the too-good-to-be-true department, Fantastic Fat-Free Bagels have yeast, flour and sugar but no oil. [http://bit.ly/bagels12] And just because you can't stomach gluten doesn't mean you can't enjoy a bagel. [http://bit.ly/bagels13]

I'm not sure what route these bakers took from the Old Country, but Hawaiian Bagels wouldn't be authentic without dried coconut and pineapple. [http://bit.ly/bagels15]

Don't try to convince Johanne Blank that a bagel should have trendy ingredients. "Most people's idea of a bagel seems to be of a vaguely squishy unsweetened doughnut, possibly with some sort of godawful flavouring mixed into it (with the blueberry bagel being perhaps the most offensive), generally purchased in lots of six in some supermarket... possibly even frozen." She then tells us at length how to create "real, honest, Jewish (Lower East Side) Purists' Bagel." [http://bit.ly/bagels16]

Speaking of purists, it takes ex-Montrealers but a few nanoseconds to bemoan the absence of the best bagels anywhere else. Travel writer Norman Goldman has trekked from the St. Viateur to the Fairmount Avenue shrines and describes what it's like to wait as the bagels are browning in those authentic wood ovens. [http://bit.ly/bagels17]

When Montreal-born astronaut Gregory Chamitoff was asked what food item he wanted to take aboard the space shuttle Discovery, the answer was simple: bagels from cousin Rhonda Shlafman, owner of Fairmount Bagel. Rivals at St. Viateur proclaimed joy to see bagels in space – even if they weren't theirs. [http://bit.ly/bagels18]

If you don't happen to live in Montreal (or have a cousin who owns a bakery there), you can try this recipe. [http://bit.ly/bagels19] Or if you prefer to follow along as you watch someone bake some bagels, you'll find numerous mentors on YouTube. [http://bit.ly/bagels20]

Now that you know how to bake a bagel, it's time to decide what to put inside it – aside from your teeth. Sure you could opt for the tried-and-true lox and cream cheese. But I came across a recipe page with some creative suggestions such as Baked Brie with Amaretto, Peppery Avocado Puree and that old standby, Pumpkin Fluff Dip. (Please note that some of the would-be bagel toppings on this page are not kosher.) [http://bit.ly/bagels21]

More than just a foodstuff, bagels have taken their rightful place in the world of philosophy. Ponder this piece of wisdom. "Life is like a bagel. It's delicious when fresh and warm, but often it's just hard." [http://bit.ly/bagels22]

Weizmann lab to be named for Nobel winner

Laura Stricker
Staff Reporter

A Weizmann Institute of Science lab in Rehovot, Israel, is being named for Sidney Brenner, a Nobel Prize-winning molecular biologist.

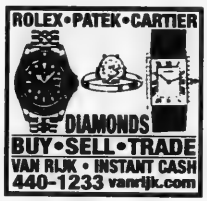
Brenner, 84, along with John Sulston and Robert Horvitz, won the prize in 2002 for their work on the genetic regulation of organ development and programmed cell death.

Brenner recently spent time in Toronto, where he made a speaking appearance at the Intercontinental Hotel.

"I would like to express my gratitude for your incredible and continued achievements both in science and in medicine," said Cathy Beck, the president of Weizmann Canada, at the event. "We at Weizmann are extraordinarily proud to have a lab named in your honour."

Brenner said he's "absolutely thrilled" to have his name associated with a group that "pursues the problems of human beings."

Brenner was at the Intercontinental with a Texas doctor, Errol Friedberg, to celebrate the recent release of Friedberg's book, Sydney Brenner: A Biography. The two spoke in front of approximately 70 people.



The event was organized by Larry Parker, who asked Weizmann to name a lab in Brenner's honour. Parker, an orthodontist, knew Brenner from when they were growing up in Germinston, South Africa.

Friedberg, also from Germinston, discussed how he came to write the biography on Brenner.

"In 1994, Sydney gave a 15-hour videotaped interview in England... over the 15 hours Sydney jumped from one topic to another, so the transcript was all over the place," he said.

"I was invited to reorganize this lengthy document into something that was more chronologically accurate, and [I was] also asked to dumb down some of the science... The result of this effort is a small book called Sydney Brenner: A Life in Science.

This first look into Brenner's life piqued Friedberg's interest.

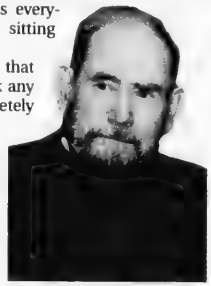
"Editing the transcript of this interview interested me enormously in Sydney's life, to the extent that I resolved to do a full-length biography one day... I broached this topic with Sydney, who graciously agreed and formally authorized the biography."

The biography, published in Sept. 2010, starts in 2002 with Brenner and his colleagues receiving the Nobel Prize. Brenner, Friedberg said, "frequently calls this prize his second Nobel, protesting that he never received the first one."

This is because, Friedberg continued, "his most creative research, work that revealed many fundamental secrets about gene function, was executed in the 1960s and 1970s – much of it with Francis Crick [best known for discovering, along with James Watson, the structure of the DNA molecule – of which Brenner was one of the first people to see it]."

Brenner's educational interests, Friedberg said, began at a young age. He was reading by the time he was four, finished three years of primary school in one year and began studying medicine at the University of the Witwatersrand in Johannesburg when he was 15. From there he studied at the University of Oxford for his PhD.

Recalling seeing Crick and Watson's DNA model in 1953, it was, Brenner said, a "revelation.



Sydney Brenner

"I thought, 'This explains everything! What are we doing sitting around, let's get on with it!'

"What was interesting is that for a few years, nobody took any notice of it. It was completely ignored by most of the people in the field."

Brenner, who is known for speaking honestly and with a sense of humour, explained his speaking method.

When he speaks in front of a crowd, he finds one person who he thinks "won't understand a word," he says, and he focuses all his attention on them.

"You'll notice that I never speak from notes. I also don't use PowerPoint because I think we've forgotten the importance of audience interaction.

"Today when they turn off the lights in the auditorium and the man gets up and says, 'I'm privileged and honoured to be invited to address this distinguished audience,' then you know that we're going to get a 'next slide, please.' Then the lights go off [and] you comfortably go to sleep."

Rejuvenated Hamilton shul opens new chapel

Abigail Cukier
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — These days, when Rabbi Dan Selsberg walks down the street in Hamilton, people roll down their car windows to express their joy.

They're sharing their excitement over the recent renewal at Beth Jacob Synagogue, which officially opened its $1.3 million "shul within a shul" this month.

The project turned a seldom-used social hall into a worship space and made the entire building accessible for seniors, people with disabilities and parents with strollers.

The renovations reflect an overall renewal at Beth Jacob.

Five years ago, membership was down, debt was climbing and parts of the building were crumbling. Today, membership has stabilized at around 400 families, debt has been dramatically reduced and new spiritual and lay leaders have revitalized the congregation.

Synagogue co-president and life-long member Cindy Richter says the congregation's high keeps getting higher every time they use the new chapel.

"I think we are experiencing a renaissance," she said. "Rabbi Selsberg and Cantor [Eyal] Bitton are just amazing. We are attracting more families and newcomers feel welcome here.

"We are all excited about continuing our renewal and attracting more people.

The gala to celebrate the new chapel included speeches, the blowing of the shofar and a performance by a klezmer band that included Hamilton's Mayor Bob Bratina on clarinet.

"People were telling me they have been in Hamilton for 60 years and had never been to a celebration more joyful than that," said Rabbi Selsberg. "There were lots of tears."

Rabbi Selsberg carried the Torah scrolls into the new chapel along with Rabbi Daniel Green of the city's Orthodox Adas Israel Congregation and Rabbi Jordan Cohen of Hamilton's Reform Temple Anshe Sholom.

"It hit people that for all of our differences, at its core, what we are about is in those scrolls and us carrying them side by side," Rabbi Selsberg said.

The project made the whole synagogue accessible. Previously, the only level access to the building, which opened in 1956, was down an incline along a gravel path, and there was no elevator.

"The first floor was difficult, and the second was completely inaccessible," Rabbi Selsberg said. "Now the whole shul is accessible, and it's beautiful."

Another pressing issue was the worship spaces. The main sanctuary, seating 660 people, was only filled for the High Holidays or a city-wide Yom HaShoah event. The congregation used a smaller, 70-seat chapel for most Shabbat and daily minyans.

To make smarter use of space and to save money, architect Les Klein designed a new worship space in the social hall, which was getting almost no use at all.

The new 160-seat chapel has movable seats, with the prayer leader in the centre of the room on a level bimah, which is also fully accessible. The entire space is finished in Jerusalem stone, which was quarried in Israel and shipped to Hamilton for this project.

"It's what people want from a synagogue," said Rabbi Selsberg. "It feels like an old synagogue, but with all of the amenities."

Reform shul forms own chevra kadisha

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's only Reform congregation, has formed its own chevra kadisha committee and is offering its members the service of taharah.

"The Chesed Shel Emes [Winnipeg's Jewish nearly 85-year-old not-for-profit Jewish funeral home] constitution won't allow them to do taharah for individuals who are not being buried in the traditional Jewish cemeteries," said Jonathan Fine, co-ordinator of Temple Shalom's new chevra kadisha committee. "But we felt that our members should have the option of traditional taharah."

The decision by the congregation to start its own chevra kadisha is a natural development following Temple Shalom's decision to found its own cemetery – Beit Chaim Mikdash Shalom – in 2004.

Temple Shalom's membership includes a sizeable number of interfaith couples. But because Winnipeg's four existing cemeteries won't bury non-Jews, Temple Shalom turned to Chapel Lawn Memorial Gardens, Cremation Centre and Funeral Home to provide burial services and plots for its members so that interfaith couples can be buried near each other.

So far, there have been about 20 burials in the section of Chapel Lawn that's been set aside for Temple Shalom's burials, and 40 more plots have been purchased by Temple Shalom members.

The congregation charges $350 to $550 for the service and clergy for funerals, $300 to rent the sanctuary, $500 if you want to rent both the sanctuary and social hall (for a condolence meal), $100 for catering services (if the family prefers that option) and a $125 custodial fee.

Chapel Lawn's casket and burial fees, which are separate from Temple Shalom's fees, are approximately $5,000.

Current costs for a funeral and burial in Winnipeg's four Jewish cemeteries range from $8,400 for members of the two synagogues that oversee the cemeteries to about $13,000 for non-members. The price includes the Chesed Shel Emes portion, plot, burial cost, perpetual care and – for members only – clergy. Non-members make their own arrangements with clergy.

Fine said he was asked to organize Temple Shalom's chevra kadisha committee a couple of years ago, shortly after he became a board member. He expressed his appreciation to Rena Boroditsky, executive director of the Chesed Shel Emes, and some of its volunteers for their help in training some Temple Shalom members in taharah and helping access some of the resources.

Montreal shoe store boycott suspended

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The anti-Israel picketing of Le Marcheur shoe store was called off last Saturday by the group Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) and won't take place this weekend either – at least not by that organization.

PAJU suspended its protests for two weeks because of the intention of the little-known Mouvement Nationaliste-Révolutionnaire Québécois (MNRQ) to take part Jan. 29.

PAJU describes the MNRQ as "national-socialist," racist and prone to violence. PAJU "tolerates no form of racism, antisemitism or xenophobia on our picket line," PAJU president Bruce Katz said in a statement.

The MNRQ's emblem incorporates an eagle similar to that of the Nazis, the old Front de liberation du Québec rifle-toting habitant, a crossed sword and hammer, and the fleur-de-lys. Its website carried a call to join the weekly demonstrations outside the St. Denis Street store, which have been going on since October.

MNRQ sympathizers may have already shown up.

There was a reported racist incident Jan. 22, when a person outside the store made a disparaging remark to a black customer.

But Katz dismissed the assertion by Quebec Conservative MP Steven Blaney that the PAJU protest amounts to "economic terrorism," calling it an attempt to silence critics of Israel through "intellectual terrorism."

Québec solidaire has retreated from the store boycott. Its sole MNA, Amir Khadir, showed up at the Dec. 11 picket, but has not returned since being roundly criticized in the media.

On Jan. 21, Khadir and party co-leader Françoise David attempted to clarify their position. The left-wing party continues to support a boycott of Israel, a policy adopted in November 2009, but they say the target is goods from that country and not individual merchants.

"Amir Khadir acknowledged that he put his feet in a place where he should not have been, because he did not fully understand the strategy [of PAJU]," she said.

Canadian Friends of Peace Now president Stephen Scheinberg distanced himself from Khadir, who cited a L'Actualité article last year by Scheinberg in which he denounced the Israel lobby's tactics against against the country's critics. Scheinberg affirmed that he is opposed to any boycott of Israel.

Le Marcheur owner Yves Archambault, meanwhile, said he'd like to get a legal injunction to stop the demonstrations. Anti-boycott activist Jacob Kincler said he is contacting lawyers who might take on this case either pro bono or for a reduced fee.

Montreal Jewish day schools set to merge

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The two oldest and largest Jewish day schools in Montreal are merging into one "pluralistic, truly community" school, they announced last week.

United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah High School (UTT/Herzliah) and Jewish People's and Peretz Schools/Bialik High School (JPPS/Bialik), both a century old and with distinct ideologies, will become one system by the 2013-14 school year, and possibly a year earlier.

While two campuses will be closed, two new ones will open: a school for grades 7 and 8 next to the YM-YWHA, and a full high school in Dollard des Ormeaux.

As previously announced, UTT/H will close its St. Laurent campus in June and consolidate at the remaining Snowdon campus. The JPPS on Van Horne Avenue will eventually close.

School leaders and Federation CJA, which is working with the schools on this remaking of the Montreal Jewish day school system, insist the primary reason for the merger is better education, not because either school is in imminent danger. Both, however, have had declining enrolments.

The news was to be presented to parents Feb. 2, but rumours had been circulating previously. One parent described the change as a "bombshell."

UTT/Herzliah president Charles Leibovich and JPPS/Bialik president Arnold Cohen said both schools are financially healthy and could continue operating separately, but would not be able to provide the highest quality of education on their own.

The aging and lack of growth of the mainstream community point to a continued struggle to maintain enrolment.

Of equal concern is the increasing popularity of non-Jewish private schools, especially high schools. The English Montreal School Board may also re-open a high school in Côte St. Luc next year, with a Jewish heritage program. The day schools are not perceived as centres of excellence by many parents, Leibovich and Cohen said.

They believe the as-yet-unnamed merged school will retain more Jewish students and ideally attract others who might go elsewhere.

An estimated 55 per cent of Montreal Jewish children attend a day school, one of the highest rates in North America. Fees range from approximately $7,000 to $10,000, which are kept relatively low because the Quebec government funds 60 per cent of the costs of the secular curriculum. As Leibovich and Cohen note, there is no guarantee that level of funding will last forever.

The plan is to create a "Jewish school, not a school for Jews," they say. UTT/Herzliah and JPPS/Bialik, while similar in their missions, do differ. The former has a more religious orientation and emphasis on teaching Jewish studies in Hebrew. JPPS is more secular, stressing Ashkenazi culture and teaching Yiddish as well as Hebrew.

Diversity, the presidents believe, can be accommodated within the much larger school that is being envisioned.

Cohen uses the term "open tent" – anyone "committed to Jewish life" will be welcome. There will be a kosher cafeteria, for example, but boys will not necessarily have to wear kippot. "Streaming" will accommodate individual expressions.

The school will be open to those who by Orthodox tradition are not considered Jewish, he said.

The merger will also mean improved secular studies, notably in French instruction, more arts and sports, and enriched and remedial programs.

UTT/Herzliah now has a separate French section, and JPPS/Bialik has a small French stream. As one school, they can have a major French section, in conformity with Bill 101, for immigrants or those who want French instruction.

The new school is modelled on such innovative schools as Los Angeles' New Community Jewish High School, Gann Academy in Boston and the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

After the merger, the Orthodox Hebrew Academy in Côte St. Luc will be the only other English mainstream school.

Leibovich and Cohen said they understand the strong attachment to the individual schools. They are both graduates of their respective systems and have or have had three children each enrolled. In Cohen's case, his kids are the fourth generation of his family to attend JPPS.

They anticipate opposition from parents, but believe that once the whole project is explained, they will gladly come on board. "Who could refuse a better, more modern school, that remains affordable and accessible?" Cohen asked. "Besides, it's the right thing to do for the community."

Although the great majority of parents have been in the dark until now, Cohen and Leibovich said it would be incorrect to say the plan is being presented as a "fait accompli." They describe the Feb. 2 meeting as the beginning of a consultation process. But how much room there is for deviation while keeping to the planned time frame is unclear.

They said discussions among school leaders began last year. In the fall, the plan was approved by the four boards, two-thirds of whose members are parents.

The presidents are firm that this is the schools' initiative and has not been imposed by the federation. The federation has been working with all mainstream schools on governance, including providing outside consultants, for the past few years.

Federation is providing fundraising expertise for the new school's construction and renovation campaign. How much will be needed has not been determined.

The federation allocates just under $3 million annually to mainstream schools to subsidize needy students, as well as for pedagogical and other non-material support. Otherwise, the schools are independent entities.

False conclusions drawn from Al Jazeera leaks

The immediate coverage of Al Jazeera's disclosure on Jan. 23 of the "Palestine Papers" shows what's wrong with instant journalism: sensationalism, a bandwagon rush to judgment, and the adoption a new storyline while forgetting the solid historical reasons for the old one.

The "Palestine Papers," leaks of unverified conversations concerning Palestinian-Israeli peace negotiations, ostensibly showed that PA leaders offered unprecedented compromises, only to be met by Israeli intransigence. The globeandmail.com headline of Jan. 23 was typical: "Israel rejected historic concessions, 'Palestine Papers' reveal."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In fact, the papers don't "reveal" any such thing about Israel.

The quotes from the leaked documents showed only that PA officials considered compromising with Israel on some of the final status issues, including settlements, refugees and Jerusalem. But none of this was "new" news. It was well known that at Camp David and Taba (2000-1) and again during the Annapolis talks (2007-8), Israelis and Palestinians had discussed all sorts of peace formulas. In the end, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas didn't reply to then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert's offers for Palestinian statehood, proposals that even Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erekat admitted to Newsweek were "serious" (June 13, 2009).

We now learn from the papers that the Palestinians weren't prepared to accept that all the settlement blocs around Jerusalem would become part of Israel in exchange for land swaps. They were willing to accept that some Jewish neighbourhoods in east Jerusalem would belong to Israel. However, they insisted on excluding Har Homa.

What is particularly shocking to the broader Palestinian and Arab public is the "revelation" that their leadership was prepared to be flexible toward Israel. This was something they've not been educated to expect and were not prepared for.

Not surprisingly, Abbas and Erekat were embarrassed by the Al Jazeera leaks (something many journalists have noted might be motivating the Qatar-based news organization, which is known for its pro-Hamas and anti-Fatah bias). And they've been busy distancing themselves from appearing to make concessions to the Jewish state, insisting the offers were entirely Israel's. How ironic.

On the issue of Palestinian refugees, some journalists have taken passages in the papers in which Abbas and Erekat discuss limiting the numbers of people who would have a "right of return" to Israel as indicating that these leaders have effectively relinquished the demand. Patrick Martin of the Globe and Mail went so far as to claim (on Jan. 25) that "Abbas and his chief negotiators are shown in 2008 to have abandoned the historical claim [of the 'right of return'], enshrined in the 1948 United Nations Resolution 194."

In fact, they did no such thing. They've never abandoned the demand, but have long said that they understand Israel's demographic concerns and, therefore, would limit the numbers of refugees they'd expect Israel to absorb. Again, all this has been known for years, so there is nothing new here.

Olmert himself said that during the Annapolis talks, he refused to accept the principle of the "right of return" but did agree to accept a very small number of Palestinians on an individual humanitarian basis. It is not generally known, but since 1948 Israel has absorbed more than 100,000 Palestinians this way – part of what is called "family reunification."

But no Israeli leader has ever, or could ever, accept the demand that millions of Palestinians in principle have a "right" to move to Israel rather than to a Palestinian state. Such a "right" doesn't exist in international law and would be a Pandora's box, exposing Israel to potentially endless future claims. Has anyone heard of the "right of return" of Muslims Pakistanis to India? Or of the "right of return" of Greeks Cypriots to the Turkish-occupied north? Only in the case of the Palestinians is such a group right asserted as a given.

Moreover, contrary to what Martin wrote, Resolution 194 does not enshrine any such right. The word "right" is not mentioned in the resolution. It's the Palestinians and their supporters who maintain this claim. It's not an objective fact and should not be stated as such.

האנרגיה החיובית שנוצרה בכנס מבטיחה שיהיה לו המשך, וכבר מדובר על כך שכנס ההמשך יתקיים בירושלים.

השנה של נטלי

סיפור עם טעם אישי:

לפני כעשר שנים התקשר אלי פרופ. אבנר הרשלג, מנהל מחלקת היולדות בלונג איילנד בניו יורק, והזמין אותי להרצות. אבנר, שהכיר אותי מישראל, שאל אותי על המוסיקה ועל תיאטרון הילדים שלי, ואז בסוף, בדרך למונית, הוא אמר לי בשקט וכדרך אגב שגם הוא קשור לשואו ביזנס, ושהוא אביה של נטלי פורטמן....

מטבע העניינים השתדלתי מאז שלא להחמיץ אף סרט שלה, ופעמיים כשהיתה בטורונטו לצילומים היא נזקקה לעזרה רפואית ושמחתי לעזור לנערה הצנועה והאינטלגנטית הזו.

אבל אם בא לכם גם להתרשם מנטלי וגם ליהנות מסרט- תרוצו ל No Strings Attached -ג'ק פליק מקסים ומצחיק שבו מראה נטלי כשרון קומי מדהים. מאוד אתמלא אם היא לא תזכה באוסקר השנה. אבל שישאר בינינו.

הוריו- אפרים סידון

תודה לרותי על הקטע הבא, שמוקדש לכולכם:

ילד ישראלי, מה יש לו בחייו?
את הוריו ואת הוריו
ואת הוריו...
והם, יום ולילה רודפים אחריו,

נושפים בעורפו, ונמצאים בעקבותיו.
מאחוריו, מצדדיו ומכל עבריו,
בחורשה עם חבריו ובלבנון בעת מארב,
בקוטב, בהימלאיה, או במדבריות ערב,
בכל אשר יפנה הם מאחוריו הגב.

עולים מן הים או באים באויריו,
צצים מן האשלה או יוצאים מהארון,
מסתתרים בתרמילו, מתחזים לחפציו,
וכל נסיונות המילוט שלו הם נסיונות שוא.

והוא יכול להיות מ"פ או טייס,
או מדען או ממציא,
והוא יכול לגלגל מליונים בבורסה
או להיות מלח בצי.

ואם ינחת על הירח או יטוס למאדים,
הם יגיעו אחריו עם עוגה ובגדים.....
והוא יכול להילחם למען עצמאות ארצו ומעמ,
אך לעולם לא יוכל להשיג עצמאות לעצמו.....

Israeli teachers honoured at Shabbat Shlichim

Abigail Cukier
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Marla Samuel graduated from Associated Hebrew Schools more than 30 years ago, but she vividly remembers the impact shlichim had on her education and experiences.

That is why she is organizing Shabbat Shlichim, along with her husband, Jack, and Amit and Merav Rotem. The event will take place on Feb. 4 and 5.

Shlichim are Israeli educators who come to Canada to live and work through the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Shabbat Shlichim will include Friday night services at Yeshivat Or Chaim in Toronto. Following that, shlichim from the Toronto area and Hamilton will go for Friday night dinner at the home of various members of the Or Chaim minyan. Later, families will gather for an Oneg Shabbat, including dessert, and will sing and socialize. Shabbat morning services will be at Yeshivat Or Chaim. Following kiddush, one of the shlichim will deliver a lecture, and all of the shlichim and their children will be guests of the Or Chaim minyan for Shabbat lunch.

Shabbat Shlichim is a way for members of the Toronto area and Hamilton communities to thank the Israeli teachers working locally.

"As a child, I remember going to the homes of the shlichim and having an Israeli meal, asking them questions, enjoying the food," Marla Samuel said. "They give that window into Israel."

The Samuels are members of the Or Chaim minyan, which is housed in the Yeshivat Or Chaim.

"The shlichim just held a celebration for Tu b'Shvat, which we otherwise might not have celebrated in such a way. They add a lot of culture and the feeling of Israel into our community. In addition to their teaching, they also work with youth groups and do other extracurricular activities," said Jack Samuel, adding that his children have benefited from the influence of the shlichim throughout their education.

"They helped inculcate a love for the land of Israel and the Hebrew language, as well as a sense of connection with Zionism and the importance of the state of Israel," he said.

The Rotems are from Israel and teach at the Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanot Orot. When they learned about the special Shabbat, they decided to help organize the celebration.

Amit Rotem says about 50 shlichim are living in the Toronto area and range in age from 18 to 50.

"The community has been very warm and welcoming," said Rotem.

The Rotems, who are in their second year in Toronto, have three daughters, ages, 11, 9 and 6. The whole family liked the idea of staying in Canada for another year.

Rotem appreciates the opportunity to be part of Shabbat Shlichim.

"It is a chance to show the strength of Israel and the power of the Israeli spirit here," he said. "The act of gathering is also very important, as the shlichim have left relatives and their lives back in Israel. They need a warm spot here, a connection.

"Toronto is very special. We also want to thank the community for welcoming us and for their support of Israel."

IDF veteran talks to students

Kortney Shapiro
Special to The CJN

Sgt. Benjamin Anthony, a veteran Israeli Defence Forces combat soldier, was in Toronto last week to speak to Jewish students about his experiences fighting in Israel's recent conflicts.

"Combat is a scenario that one cannot fully understand until you have actually participated in it," Anthony said during an interview with The CJN.

But Anthony, who founded Our Soldiers Speak, a non-profit organization that aims to present facts about Israel's recent conflicts and military campaigns, travels around the world hoping to shed some light on IDF soldiers' experiences.

Anthony, a graduate of the University of Manchester, said he was inspired to start the organization in 2006 when he was asked to give a speech at a Yom Hazikaron event in his native United Kingdom.

"One of the local synagogues had forgotten to mark Yom Hazikaron… And out of sheer desperation, they contacted me [to deliver] a seven-minute talk," he recalled.

"[I] reluctantly decided to speak for 20 minutes because it's not a subject one can deal with in seven minutes."

Later that year, Anthony, who had moved from the United Kingdom to Israel to join the army in his mid-20s, was encouraged to organize lectures to share his first-hand experience of serving with the IDF.

Anthony attributed his decision to move to Israel to his father.

"My father ensured that within our blood flowed a fervour of Zionistic interest, support, and the idea that words are cheap… Action is what is required. Correct action at the right time."

To date, Our Soldiers Speak has organized lectures at more than 120 universities in the United Kingdom, South Africa, the United States and Canada, and has plans to present lectures in Israel as well.

Anthony, who spoke at campuses and other Jewish centres throughout Ontario last month, met with some opposition when he visited the University of Western Ontario on Jan 19.

Most of those who gathered at the event were anti-Israel protesters, but once the protesters left, students who were interested in hearing what Anthony had to say were able to enjoy the lecture.

He said that dealing with protesters who resist his message isn't uncommon.

"Certainly [there are] threats, difficulties and those who bear you ill will… It may be easier to become intimidated by that, but there are two factors that are important to me," Anthony explained.

"The first factor is it's not nearly as intimidating as the things I have experienced in the past as a soldier in the field… But the second is this – whatever the threat, danger… it's not nearly as bad as it will become if we do not push back."

Anthony, who recognizes that there are many students who support Israel and his cause said, "I am grateful for them and for their support. They do not go unnoticed."

But, he added, sometimes moral support isn't enough.

"It troubles me that there are so many pro-Israel students, pro-Zionist, pro-Jewish [individuals], but feel that that is enough and feel that they do not need to ask, debate or present themselves… and that is a huge error."

In a call to all students who care about the State of Israel, Anthony said, "Please know that anything I am able to achieve on the front lines of combat will never be nearly as consequential as the actions you undertake in the battle for public opinion.

"So you must find your courage and live by your convictions."

Obstetrician specializes in high-risk births

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Dr. Jon (Yosef) Barrett would probably agree with the aphorism that an apple doesn't fall from the tree. Like his father, Theodor Herzl Carl, he specializes in obstetrics and gynecology.

As chief of Sunnybrook Health Science Centre's maternal fetal medicine division, Barrett delivers low-risk and high-risk babies.

In a 20-year career, he has delivered about 6,000 infants.

"To become a partner in the birth process is a remarkable experience," he said in an interview in his office early in the new year. "There is nothing else I'd rather do. It gives me immense satisfaction."

Barrett, who recently turned 50 and was the subject of a CBC TV profile on The National last fall, earned his medical degree in 1983, when he lived in South Africa.

But long before he ever studied medicine, he knew he harboured dreams of becoming a doctor.

His father inculcated this ambition in him, taking him along on hospital rounds from the time he was only five years old. "He involved me in his work," Barrett recalled.

By careful observation, Barrett came to the realization that medicine in general, and obstetrics in particular, were his twin callings. "I now realize that my ambition is a rare thing," he explained. "Most people don't know what they want to do when they're so young. I never had a doubt."

Barrett's certitude has taken him far since his arrival in Toronto in 1992 to assume a fellowship in high-risk pregnancy at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Since then, he has carved out a niche at Sunnybrook – which he joined in 1995 – started teaching obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Toronto and signed on as an adviser to the World Health Organization.

Chassidic philosophy part of obstetrician's day

Barrett, the father of four children, also directs a multiple pregnancy clinic at Sunnybrook – officially known as the Ante Natal Multiples Clinics – and is the lead investigator of another project, the Twin Birth Study.

The multiple pregnancy clinic, launched at the end of 1996, was established to fill a pressing need. With increasing numbers of women giving birth to more than a single baby due to in vitro fertilization, it dawned on physicians that they required special care.

"There was a need to look after these women," said Barrett, who is highly regarded by patients, judging from the website RateMDs.

Thanks to the clinic, most major hospitals in Canada have opened similar clinics, resulting in better and more standardized care.

The Twin Birth Study, whose final results will be released in 2012, has been called the world's single biggest obstetrics investigation.

Funded by the Canadian Institutes of Health Research in more than 140 centres in about 30 countries, its objective is to determine whether vaginal birth is superior to caesarean birth.

Barrett – who's also chief of obstetrics and gynecology at York Central Hospital, a position he fills once a week – delivers from 250 to 300 infants per year. When he's on call, once a week, he sleeps at the hospital.

In a typical year, he delivers 40 twins, but also delivers triplets and quadruplets. Only in one instance has he delivered quintuplets. "We knew five were coming," he said. "The mother had a caesarean."

Roughly half the births in which he is involved concern high-risk babies, where the chance of "a bad outcome" is significantly higher than a low-risk birth. Although he has never lost a baby at birth, "tens" of his high-risk infants have died after delivery, succumbing to complications, he noted.

Born in Johannesburg, he is the scion of Lithuanian Jews on both sides of his family who immigrated to Britain in the 1930s to escape the rising tide of fascism and antisemitism in Lithuania.

Ironically, his father left Britain after inaccurately being told that a Jewish doctor had no hope of becoming a consultant in Britain's national health care system. He and his wife settled in South Africa in 1950.

Having completed his medical studies at the University of Witwatersrand, Barrett went to Britain in 1986 to complete his training. "I didn't see a future for South Africa," he said. "I always knew apartheid was wrong and unsustainable. There was much hatred in the country."

For him, the tipping point was South Africa's war in Angola. "I didn't want to be fighting and getting killed," he said in a reference to the possibility of being conscripted into the army and sent to Angola's front lines.

Multiple pregnancy clinic fills pressing need

Armed with a British passport, he followed in his father's footsteps, finding a job at St. James Hospital, which is affiliated with the University of Leeds. He continued his studies at the University of Newcastle.

In Britain, he and his wife, Lauren – a bereavement psychologist – turned to Orthodox Judaism.

Barrett was a traditional Jew in South Africa. But in Britain, he became far more observant. A decade ago, he joined the Chabad sect. Interestingly, one of his ancestors in Lithuania was a rosh yeshiva.

Barrett, who wears tzitzit and a kippah while on duty, left Britain mainly because he didn't feel comfortable as an observant Jew there.

He is troubled by no such angst in Toronto, where he usually starts his day at 5:30 a.m. First he exercises and then he goes to shul. From his home in Thornhill, he drives to Sunnybrook, listening to CDs of the Tanya (an early work of chassidic philosophy) and Chumash.

Although Sunnybrook's team system enables him to take the Sabbath off, he would gladly go to work to save a life. As he put it, "The Gemara says, 'You can turn on a light for a woman in labour.'"

Website warns of weather-related symptoms

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

Think your ailments are feeling worse because of the weather? You might be right.

Dr. John Bart and meteorologist Denis Bourque have created a website to help warn people about the incoming weather systems and how they might cause ailments to flare up.

"The product is very simple," Bourque said. "We offer a service where you can get warned – via e-mail or by looking on our website – about when the weather could possibly aggravate one of six ailments you might be interested in."

Using their mathematics, they can determine whether migraines, heart disease, asthma, arthritis, diabetes or chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD) are likely to flare up in your area.

The two men started their website, www.mediclim.com, in January 2009, but the idea went back much further than that.

"Many years ago, Denis came into my office after a number of patients in the previous week had the same diagnosis," Bart said. "I said to him, 'I think the weather has something to do with the way people turn up.'"

Bart didn't think any more about it at the time, but Bourque looked into it, and sure enough, the doctor was right.

"Denis called me a few weeks later and said that there is a world of research linking weather and health," Bart said.

The two have worked together since 1986, have had their findings published in journals and have spoken at conferences.

However, they couldn't get the funding for much additional research until 2007.

"At that time, the Canadian government started giving out money for some individual scientific research projects that linked climate change with the health of Canadians," Bart said.

After hiring some statisticians and working out some weather algorithms, the pair found deeper meanings in the patterns.

"If you look at the weather patterns from Toronto to Ottawa, which is usually the way it moves, and you look at temperature or pressure or humidity alone, there's no correlation between the increase of symptoms in each place," Bart said.

"However, using the MediClim index, there's a percentage increase that's equivalent."

Essentially, that means if there's a six per cent increase or decrease in symptoms in Toronto, there will be a similar one in Ottawa once that weather pattern hits.

"We knew then that our algorithm was statistically viable," Bart said.

"This research applies to what is known as the temperate zone," Bourque said. "That includes the continental United States, Canada (south of the 60th parallel) and most of Europe."

More research is underway to determine the viability of these algorithms in Japan and South Korea, and preliminary work is being done in Australia.

Ultimately, the hope is that all of this work will help others.

"The benefit of it is improvement of quality of life," Bourque said. "For those who suffer these ailments because of weather, this provides them with advance information they can use to their advantage to mitigate the degree of the problem or manage it better."

This isn't to be confused with a strictly medical site, though.

"We don't give medical advice directly to people," Bart said. "We advise them to do what their doctor tells them to do."

But since he is a physician, Bart does post on the site what he tells his patients who suffer from the same symptoms.

And those who receive the e-mails do seem to appreciate what they're being told.

"Nearly 75 per cent of our subscribers said that it better helped them manage their ailment," Bourque said. "I would have been happy even with just 25 per cent.

"This was far better than what I'd anticipated."

Dr. John Bart, left, and Denis A. Bourque

'Managing weight is a lifelong challenge'

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Toronto psychiatrist and author Barry Simon has devoted most of his professional life to helping people manage their weight.

The co-author of two books on weight loss, The Winning Weigh (Prentice Hall 1991), and Breaking the Weight Loss Barrier (Prentice Hall 1996), he has been counselling people on issues pertaining to lifestyle and health since the early 1990s.

He is the founder of the Shift Method, a program offering weight management "solutions from the inside out."

Simon traces his professional interest in weight management to his undergraduate days when he studied counselling psychology. "I wanted to understand the reasons why people don't adhere to good advice."

He says he sees many people with serious health issues. "Changing their lifestyle is critical to their health, yet for them, taking steps to improve their health is a daunting behavioural and emotional challenge.

"For most people, trying to lose weight is not strictly knowing about what to eat or not to eat. It's about learning how to master those five or six challenging moments in a day.

The Shift program combines cognitive behavior strategies with lifestyle-change principles, he explains. "We teach people how to manage stress and to change the way they think and relate to food."

He says the direction of his practice has changed over the years and has evolved into a multi-disciplinary program that includes his wife, Susan Eiley, an adult educator and certified lifestyle counsellor; Fran Berkoff, a registered dietitian, and registered psychologist John Fleming.

Simon says research has shown that people who have gone through an inner transformation and developed skills and strategies to conquer other challenges besides eating tend to be more successful in maintaining their weight loss. "They have changed the way they approach problems."

Shift offers several program options, which include seminar programs that span several weeks or a year-long program that includes a one-on-one lifestyle assessment and months of group work.

The initial assessment developed by the psychologist looks at personal factors that may impact people's eating patterns, says Simon. "We do a comprehensive assessment looking at evidence-based research that examines personality styles, ways of thinking and how people manage their emotions.

"People discover the specific issues that affect their eating behavior and learn individualized strategies geared to their specific profile... Profiling doesn't point to an actual diagnosis, but to a psychological way of functioning that needs to be addressed."

Dr. Barry Simon

The initial eight weeks, which is called the weight mastery program, is an intensive period of group work with no more than eight people per group.

In the second part of the program, clients participate in workshops that deal with such issues as conquering cravings, emotional eating and accepting body image. There are also followup groups to support weight-loss maintenance.

Simon says Eiley has structured the program to create an environment geared to the way adults learn. Her approach is "solution focused with an emphasis on an individual's strengths.

"Fran plays an instrumental role in providing nutritional guidance and direction around meal planning and food choices. The program also promotes increased physical activity."

Simon advises people to be skeptical of weight-loss programs offering magic-bullet solutions. "Managing weight is a lifelong challenge, and anytime you stop using the skills you've developed the problem comes back."

People commonly blame their weight problems on willpower, but Simon makes it clear that for many people, brain chemistry is a factor as some foods can be addictive. "There is more and more research that high-fat and high-sugar foods trigger insatiability in the brain."

He says helping people with weight management issues is very personal for him, because he was overweight at one point in his childhood and that experience propelled him into the weight-management field. "When I was 11 or 12, I was 25 or 30 pounds overweight.

"I remember when the pediatrician told my mother that I was obese. I remember it was a shameful experience."

Program can help the brain relearn skills

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

In the past, researchers believed that once a person experienced a brain injury, the damage was permanent.

In the last 40 years, however, brain research has shown that, with appropriate intervention, positive changes can take place, even years after the injury was sustained, says Rebecca Gruber who founded One Step Ahead Mobility with her partner Jan Goldstein Elman.

Gruber and Goldstein Elman have been practising physiotherapists for more than 20 years. Both are on the faculty of the physical therapy department at the University of Toronto.

They focus on adults and seniors with chronic illnesses – strokes, brain injury, heart disease, diabetes, Parkinson's, multiple sclerosis, osteoporosis and other conditions.

People who sustain a brain injury or illness develop something called learned non-use, where they overuse an unaffected extremity because they have difficulty using the injured side, Gruber explains.

But a treatment called Constraint Induced Movement Therapy (CIMT) was pioneered and researched at the University of Alabama in Birmingham. Gruber and Goldstein Elman went to the Birmingham clinic to become certified in CIMT.

Gruber says CIMT is based on neuroplasticity or the ability of the brain to reorganize after an injury such as a stroke if the patient uses the right type of intensity and physical practice "thus leading to improved overall physical function."

She stresses that it takes intensive practice and a gradual increase in the difficulty of the exercise used.

"We focus on what a person does at home in his or her everyday life. For those who need hand and arm therapy, they are asked to wear a restraining mitt on their functioning hand to encourage them to use their injured limb during the course of therapy."

Rebecca Gruber, left, and Jan Goldstein Elman of One Step Ahead Mobility

For lower extremity injuries, therapists encourage patients to rely on their affected leg to perform repetitive exercises.

After completing therapy at the clinic, therapists design an individualized at-home program that helps patients maintain the continued improvements.

It is not feasible, Gruber says, in our government health-care fee structure, to support this intensive program, and the service is not covered by OHIP.

At the interview, Gruber noted that one of their clients was unable to use her left hand. After CIMT training, she has regained use of her arm and was able to brush her teeth with her affected hand.

Harvey Joseph, a father, grandfather and practising lawyer, suffered a stroke in 2008 that affected his left side. He was initially severely limited in his ability to sit, stand up or walk. Joseph took the government-funded rehabilitation and he has returned to his practice and family activities, but to maximize his ability to use his affected left side, he has begun an intensive 15-day physiotherapy program for 3-1/2 hours a day in the CIMT program at One Step Ahead Mobility.

"During his course of CIMT physiotherapy, Mr. Joseph will practise progressively more challenging tasks and use specialized equipment to assist the process in neuroplasticity and physical rehabilitation," Gruber says.

Canadian physician Norman Doidge, in his best-selling book titled, The Brain That Changes Itself, describes CIMT in detail.

Gruber notes that CIMT pioneer Dr. Edward Taub says that the great majority of stroke patients who have completed CIMT "experience substantial, significant, clinically meaningful improvement."

The CIMT program was originally developed for people after a stroke. It is now being studied for other chronic conditions such as MS.

One Step Ahead Mobility, which concentrates solely on physical mobility for adults with chronic illnesses, is located at Bathurst Street and Glencairn Avenue.

For more information on CIMT or any of their other programs, call 416-783-7175 or go to www.onestepaheadmobility.com.

What can Botox® do for you?

Botox®, which is marketed as Botox Cosmetic® for cosmetic purposes, is a muscle-relaxing agent that has proven to be a safe and effective ally in the battle against the aging face. It smoothes out forehead wrinkles, frown lines (which can create an angry facial expression), crow's feet, and lines around the upper lip, and it can relax prominent neck cords. In addition, Botox® significantly reduces excessive underarm sweating.

What does the treatment involve?

Botox® is injected into a few points either in the skin or in the muscles under the skin. It takes less than 15 minutes to perform, and patients can resume their daily activities right away. Significant improvement is usually seen within a week, and the best result appears after a few weeks.

ACCREDITATION: Dr. Stephen Kraft is one of Canada's Botox® pioneers. In 1985, he became the first doctor in Ontario to use Botox®. Fitness centre offers yoga and spinning

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

They say east is east and west is west and never the twain shall meet. But this old adage doesn't apply to Spynga Yoga and Cycling Studio.

This innovative fitness centre combines the eastern discipline of yoga with indoor cycling, a western-style high-intensity cardio workout.

Spynga (www.spynga.com) is the brainchild of Sari Nisker and Casey Soer. The two exercise devotees – they are both 36 and grew up in Thornhill – have been best friends for more than 25 years.

Nisker is passionate about yoga and became a yoga teacher, while Soer, a cycling enthusiast, is a certified spinning instructor. In 2003, both of them happened to be living in New York, and each woman developed an appreciation for the other friend's preferred mode of exercise.

"We attended each other's classes and watched our bodies transform," recalls Nisker, noting that the cardio workout from spinning improved her stamina and core strength.

Soer, in turn, discovered the benefits of the strength and flexibility training, as well as the meditative aspects of yoga. "We began to see that blending these modalities together gives an all-encompassing workout," she said.

The two friends – they are both certified instructors in both yoga and spinning – decided to start a studio in Toronto that offered both indoor cycling and yoga. The south Spynga studio (416-588-7796), at Bathurst Street and St. Clair Avenue, opened in 2007.

They also developed the popular Spynga Flow class, which combines both types of exercise. "The concept brings the two exercise methods together in an hour for a balanced workout," says Nisker. "The magic is that those who like more cardio can get their cardio fix and then they get to explore their other side."

People sweat through a spinning class for half an hour and then they move to the floor for stretching and deep breathing in a half-hour yoga session.

Other courses offered include indoor cycling and vinyasa, yin, power, restorative and pre-and post-natal yoga. There are also yoga classes for children and teens, cardio classes and seasonal detox workshops.

Soer describes vinyasa yoga as "a flowing yoga." She notes the Yoga 101 course is geared to beginners and intermediates. "It's broken down so that people can master the postures and breathing."

The centre also runs teacher-training programs offering certification in indoor cycling, yoga and Spynga instruction. Spynga Flow is now a registered trademark that is being licensed to other gyms. In July, Soer and Nisker opened their second studio, Spynga North (905-882-7799), near Bathurst and Centre streets.

The new studio is going very well, says Soer. "So far, people in Thornhill are really embracing Spynga."

She stresses that it doesn't matter what one's experience or skill set is, because people go at their own pace. "There's no need for different levels. There's something for everyone.

"The more advanced practitioner can work harder on the bike or go into a deeper stretch in yoga. You take it to your own level."

Purists can take cycling or yoga classes, but Soer says she and Nisker recommend that people give the Spynga Flow class a try. "We have a lot of people who begin in cycling classes and then end up doing more yoga and vice versa."

She says a new class, the Zone 8 Ride, was recently introduced. "It gives someone a balanced workout that includes weight training and cardio."

The class includes cycling and works on six different body zones for eight minutes at a time. It is similar to the Zone 8 Cardio-Sculpt, which also has six eight-minute zones. However, this class incorporates the weight training with some elements of yoga such as balance and some of the postures.

Twice a year – in January and May – Spynga runs Dare To Do 30, a 30-day weight-loss program that incorporates 30 days of cycling and yoga, as well as assistance from weight-loss counselling with nutritionist Joey Shulman.

Soer says yoga is beneficial for every age group from toddlers to seniors. "My dad comes five days a week. He's 66 with back and knee ailments.

"He's been taking the Spynga Flow class and he says he feels 20 years younger."

Toronto doctor pioneered non-invasive heart surgery

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Dr. Gideon Cohen keeps a box in his office filled with thank-you cards. "They're my biggest source of gratification," he said. "I'll cherish them forever."

The cards are from a legion of grateful patients whose lives he saved.

Cohen, 45, is a cardiovascular surgeon at the Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, the only physician in the hospital who performs a surgical procedure that is at once less invasive but also more technically demanding than conventional open-heart surgery.

A graduate of the University of Toronto who finished first in his class, he was the first physician in Canada to perform the minimally invasive operation, which is designed to correct a condition known as atrial fibrillation, or irregular heartbeat.

The procedure, which is also employed in bypass surgery to deal with blockages in the heart, was developed in the United States about a decade ago. Since he performed the first such procedure in Toronto eight years ago, physicians throughout Canada have followed his lead.

The doctor who performs it does not need to open the chest or stop the heart. Instead, surgery is performed through what he describes as a "keyhole."

Small incisions are made on the side of the chest and a miniature camera is inserted into the patient's body. The surgeon uses special instruments to deal with the problem at hand.

"No one in Canada was doing it because it's not a simple procedure to perform," said Cohen, who works at the Schulich Heart Centre and who has performed about 100 such procedures since 2003. "It's very technically challenging and takes longer than an open-chest procedure."

Although there are risks in both procedures, the less invasive one has clear advantages.

It is cosmetically superior, delivers less pain and enables the patient to return to functionality in weeks rather than months.

However, the technique, covered by government health plans, is more expensive by a margin of $5,000 to $10,000, he noted.

It is more costly than open-chest surgery because the ministry of health does not provide funding for the special camera and specialized instruments that are used.

The procedure cannot be performed on just any patient. "Age is a factor," he explained. "If you're elderly and frail, you're not a candidate."

Body weight and anatomic factors also enter into the equation, added Cohen, an associate professor at the University of Toronto.

As Cohen suggested, the procedure daunts many physicians.

"Since it's more challenging mentally and physically, it transfers pain from the patient to the surgeon. You have to be extremely meticulous. Every move you make can be fatal."

The first patient in Canada to submit to it was a 45-year-old policeman who suffered from heart valve abnormalities. "He requested it because he wanted to get back to work as soon as possible."

Cohen admits he was somewhat apprehensive on the eve of performing the procedure. "There was an element of anxiety. It hadn't been done before in this country."

It was a success.

"He's entirely back to normal," said Cohen, who normally performs many more conventional open-chest procedures than the less invasive surgery.

Be they conventional or non-conventional, heart operations are one of the most labour-intensive procedures in medicine. They require a surgeon, one or two assistants, a scrub nurse, a circulating nurse, an anesthetist and an assistant and a heart-lung machine technician.

Cohen, who was educated at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Associated Hebrew Schools, graduated from William Lyon Mackenzie Institute.

He always aspired to be a surgeon, and chose cardiovascular surgery because he is an "adrenaline junkie."

He elaborated, "Every [heart] operation is a life/death situation. It's a specialty where you can immediately appreciate the fruits of your labour. The heart either works or doesn't work."

Cohen, who works from 60 to 70 hours a week, is particularly pleased that his expertise can prolong life and induce happiness.

New babies: amazing and challenging

Marni Brinder Byk
Special to The CJN

Having a son has been the most wonderful, fulfilling, magical experience, and I truly believe that being a mother is the most challenging, amazing and rewarding job a person could imagine.

That being said, I also now understand why babies are so adorable – because it allows us to forgive them for all of their tiring, disgusting habits.

There are some very important things to learn about babies. You will never sleep again. As I write this, I am trying to stay awake while my son takes a nap. Last week, he decided to not sleep at night, and my husband and I spent many hours on the couch while he giggled and hit us in the face as we tried to rock him back to sleep.

He is like an evil genius, and we are nothing more than his minions.

I should also mention that your personal hygiene suffers when you have a baby. If I have to choose between a bath and a nap, there's no competition.

This is only made worse when you consider how dirty a mother can get during the course of one day. Babies spit up, and more often than not, it's on you. And if you're not in any hurry to shower, you sure aren't looking to do any extra laundry, so you simply wipe it off and continue on with your day. Gross. If you're lucky, you have friends with babies that you can spend time with, so you can blame the smell on someone else.

Ryan and his mom Marni

You also can't rely on anything anymore. Something he likes to eat one day, he refuses to consume the next. One night of decent sleep doesn't necessarily ensure another. Leaving the house is a task that requires careful planning, because babies always fill a diaper or throw up just as you put a new outfit on them or put them in their car seat. It's a reminder that whatever you have planned is not nearly as important as your little prince or princess.

But the greatest thing I've learned throughout this wonderful year is my capacity for love. Someone once said to me that when you look at your baby, you realize in an instant you would do anything for them, and really, they are virtual strangers. I have stayed up all night, walked around with various bodily fluids on my clothing in public, and missed various social engagements willingly. Why? Because he has my chin and thinks I'm hysterical, and his face lights up when I walk into a room.

When he laughs, I forget how tired I am, how bad I smell and how I no longer have much of a social life outside of play dates.

He's the embodiment of all my love.

He's also very smart, because he's right – I am hysterical.

Colon Cancer is Preventable
Like screening for breast, cervical, and prostate cancer, colon cancer screening is necessary and saves lives. The endoscopist carefully looks in your colon for abnormalities such as polyps (growths that can become cancer), and removes any polyps during your colonoscopy.
Advantages provided by the Vaughan Endoscopy Clinic include:
✓ Wait times for appointments are considerably shorter.
✓ Patients achieve their consultation and endoscopy in one visit
✓ The clinic uses the most advanced equipment and technology.
✓ The clinic is in a medical facility designed for patient comfort.
✓ Anesthesiologists administer conscious sedation for patients.

Up to two million Canadians have kidney disease

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Recent estimates suggest that as many as two million Canadians have chronic kidney disease (CKD) or are at risk of developing it, says Wendy Kudeba, director of marketing and communications of the Kidney Foundation of Canada, Ontario branch.

"Most are unaware of it," she adds.

According to the Canadian Institute for Health Information in Ottawa, each day, an average of 14 Canadians learn that their kidneys have failed.

"In Ontario, there are more than 15,000 under treatment for chronic kidney failure," Kudeba says.

There are thousands more who suffer from other kidney-related disorders such as urinary tract infection and kidney stones.

Kidney disease may affect your diet, your emotional and physical well-being, your family and the things you do for fun and exercise, the Kidney Foundation of Canada's publication, Living with Kidney Disease, notes.

The main task of kidneys is to remove waste products from the blood and return the clean blood to the body along with other necessary elements.

Chronic kidney disease is defined as the presence of kidney damage or a decreased level of kidney function for a period of three months or more.

It is divided into five stages. It usually starts slowly and silently and progresses over a number of years. Not everyone progresses from Stage 1 to Stage 5.

A diagnosis of end-stage renal disease indicates that your kidneys are working at less that 15 per cent of normal.

At this stage, dialysis or kidney transplantation is needed to replace the normal functioning of the kidneys.

Some kidney diseases are inherited and others develop as we grow older.

The Kidney Foundation of Canada notes that the exact cause of many types of kidney disease is not well understood. Often, it is associated with other medical conditions including diabetes, hypertension and heart disease.

The loss of kidney function is usually very gradual, and in some cases, the problem may go undetected until the kidneys are severely damaged.

Simple laboratory tests such as urinalysis look for protein in blood and urine and are useful in detecting damage at an early stage.

A blood test is often used to check the serum creatinine level as a simple measure of kidney function. Creatinine is a chemical waste molecule that is filtered by the kidneys, and if the level is high, it can indicate possible kidney problems.

Volunteers in T-shirts with a kidney shape on the back are seen resting, at a recent walk for the Kidney Foundation of Canada.

The Kidney Foundation outlines some factors that help prevent the progress of CKD, including a well balanced diet, regular physical activity, good blood pressure control, cessation of smoking, weight control, limiting daily alcohol to two drinks or less a day, good management of diabetes and taking medications as prescribed.

"There are many research projects which we hope will lead to earlier detection and improved treatment options," Kudeba says.

March is Kidney Health Month, and "there are many special events and educational sessions across the country throughout the month," she notes.

Therapy clinic offers services for children

Marni Brinder Byk
Special to The CJN

Collage Pediatric Therapy provides a team of speech-language pathologists, psychologists, occupational therapists, physical therapists and play therapists who work together to help the children they see.

They assess, evaluate and provide treatment and recommendations for children with a number of childhood disorders and disabilities including autism spectrum disorder, fine and gross motor delays, reading disorders, global developmental delay and learning disabilities.

A private multidisciplinary clinic, Collage says it provides the best in professional care, all under one roof, offering the convenience of back-to-back therapy appointments with different clinicians in the same centre.

Collage currently has centres in Westmount and Pointe-Claire in Quebec as well as in Vancouver. It opened its newest site in Mississauga in the fall of 2010, and a new centre is opening this winter in Thornhill.

Marieve Karman, an occupational therapist with Collage Pediatric Therapy in Mississauga, emphasizes "how critical it is to intervene early. However, it is unfortunate that many parents spend a considerable amount of time trying to have their child seen by a professional in the public system."

Costs for the private therapy services are based on an initial assessment followed by individual treatment plans. In additional to flexible payment options, families meeting certain household income requirements may qualify for funding from certain foundations.

Jennifer Sailofsky, a clinical physiotherapist and director of motor services, oversees physical and occupational therapy for all sites throughout Canada. Sailofsky says that all clinical directors meet regularly and depend on one another to integrate their expertise for their patients so that they can provide early diagnosis, hypothesis and analysis.

Collage Pediatric Therapy also recommends the appropriate medical professionals for further treatment. According to Sailofsky, they use standardized tests in assessing their patients to ascertain if they are functioning at their appropriate age level.According to Collage Pediatric Therapy's website, parents should seek therapy if a child demonstrates difficulty in a variety of areas, which are broken down by age groups. For infants, it can be anything from lack of eye contact to reduced use or movement of limbs, just to name two indicators. For toddlers and preschoolers, it lists possible receptive and expressive language concerns, voice, fluency-stuttering, articulation, swallowing-feeding challenges, sensory processing disorders, adaptive skills, fine motor or gross motor difficulties and challenges faced by school-aged children that perhaps need to be assessed.

Collage stresses that "in younger clients, great progress can be achieved through early intervention."

For further information about when to seek therapy, visit www.collagetherapies.com or contact 905-402-3122.

Physician trains Israeli doctors

Much to his satisfaction, heart surgery has made great strides since his graduation from medical school in 1992.

"It has evolved tremendously. New techniques offer high-risk individuals hope."

Cohen, who was born in London, England, said he owes his career to his parents, Nechemia and Malka, who made financial sacrifices to ensure that he and his two sisters – a lawyer and an orthodontist today – received a proper Jewish and secular education.

His father, an Israeli who served in the Palmach fighting force in Israel's War of Independence, was a teacher of the self-care Mitzvah Technique of body mechanics.

A seventh-generation resident of Jerusalem, he and his wife – a registered nurse and midwife whose parents were Yemenite Jews – immigrated to Canada in the early 1970s.

Cohen, a skier and snowboarder in his spare time, met his wife, Meghan, a neurophysiologist, at Sunnybrook. They have two children, Addison, 2, and Jacob, eight months old.

Cohen, who is fluent in Hebrew and visits Israel regularly, is trying to create a fund to help Israeli doctors in training at Sunnybrook.

"They're often in a situation of financial hardship," he said. "They can't send their kids to Jewish day school or summer camp."

He makes a point of involving himself in the training of Israeli doctors at Sunnybrook, and is pleased to report that cardiovascular surgery in Israel is on a high level.

Cardiac care advances made at Southlake

By Jennifer M. Macleod
Special to the CJN

Awareness and fundraising campaigns have given the public information about heart disease and stroke. But one heart condition, atrial fibrillation, isn't well-known despite the fact that almost 250,000 Canadians – about six per cent of us 65 and up – suffer from the condition, which can destroy a victim's health and even lead to death.

One doctor, Yaariv Khaykin, a cardiac electrophysiologist with Southlake Regional Health Centre in Newmarket, is changing that with new advances in surgical technology.

Atrial fibrillation (AF) is the most common type of arrhythmia (abnormal heart rhythm) caused by "short-circuiting" muscles near the upper portion of the heart. Though it's considered a fairly benign condition, the inefficient pumping of a heart with AF can cause episodes of chest fluttering or pain, shortness of breath, fatigue, and – more seriously – send blood clots to lungs or even the brain, causing up to 20 per cent of all strokes in Canada.

Many doctors offer medications to control AF, assuming that patients would prefer to avoid surgery. But, Khaykin warns, "drugs are on average [only] about 40 per cent effective... and there are a lot of side effects." Drug side effects may be minor, he admits, but they can also "potentially cause patients to go into more dangerous arrhythmias, they may cause [more dangerous] ventricular arrhythmias, and in some cases, they may cause death."

Surgical treatment, says Khaykin, offers a better chance at a normal life – if it becomes more readily available. The latest technologies, he says, may put this hope within reach at last. "There's a lack of awareness for family and family physicians about available therapies... patients get stuck on medications because physicians are simply not aware that therapies are available."

The most common procedure to correct AF is called ablation, which uses a catheter, a long wire with electrodes at the tip, threaded into the heart to ablate, or cauterize, an area of the heart which is "short-circuiting," sending mistimed signals that are causing the arrhythmia.

"Using electrodes we can find areas in the heart that are responsible for causing the arrhythmia and we can... cauterize them." The technology is actually similar to that used by dermatologists for removing moles. "There's no cutting or stitching... it's minimally invasive," he adds. The surgery is performed entirely through the patient's veins and arteries.

But because the operation requires such precision, it takes up to six hours per procedure. Until recently, that meant that highly specialized surgeons such as Khaykin have typically been able to perform only one per day. The Southlake Regional Health Centre has about 300 AF patients on their waiting list at any given time. "Wait times have been fairly consistently about a year on average," says Khaykin.

But new technology, including a new device for radio-frequency ablation recently approved by Health Canada, promises to make the turnaround much quicker, making surgical correction of AF possible for far more patients. Khaykin is already able to perform at least two procedures in a day and sees that rising consistently to three procedures in the near future.

The new system, developed by Minneapolis-based medical technology company Medtronic, lets heart specialists better identify and selectively burn a broader area of the heart tissue. Southlake was the first North American hospital to roll out the Medtronic device, though it has since been adopted in other centres, including one in Montreal.

Other innovations at Southlake include improved three-dimensional imaging systems, letting surgeons better visualize the area. "Traditional ablation is guided by X-ray alone," while the newer system allows Khaykin to see "an entire virtual map of whichever chamber we're working with." GPS-like technology lets him easily and accurately locate the tip of the catheter within that 3-D map.

For the patient, this means a quicker repair and less extended exposure to X-ray radiation. But technological advances are also benefiting other doctors: another new system lets Khaykin broadcast, in real time, the visuals of any procedure. "Ultrasound, 3-D mapping system... we put it all on one screen and broadcast them in HD video," he said, along with real-time, bi-directional audio. Observers anywhere in the world can now use the Internet to interact with the surgeon during the procedure, letting Khaykin and his colleagues share their skills with other physicians, and ultimately making these benefits of technology available to more patients across Canada and worldwide.

Khaykin believes the high cost of caring for individuals with AF puts a huge strain on our health-care system. Studies have shown that the costs of surgery, as compared to ongoing medication, "break even at about three to five years."

Yet government restrictions currently hinder his ability to care for patients, and no new technology can help in that area. "One of the major reasons we have a wait list [is that] we're not funded to do as many procedures, to treat as many patients as we could possibly treat. If we're only funded for 200 cases a year, we're going to have a long wait list no matter how many I can perform," he said.

Nevertheless, Khaykin is more than thrilled to see these technologies first in a regional centre, sometimes, even before the big downtown Toronto hospitals. "People don't know we're out there," says Khaykin, but "a lot of the time we're able to offer therapies before they're offered at the academic hospitals."

Prairie students get advocacy tools

Conference held in Calgary

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' Prairie Province Conference in Calgary last month gave about 50 Jewish students the opportunity to learn from some of Canada's most influential Jewish leaders and network with their peers.

Students heard presentations from the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy's executive vice-president, Susan Davis, on "How to be a global Zionist"; the American Jewish Committee's director of national and legislative affairs, Richard Folton, on "Religious freedom on university campuses", and from the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee's national outreach co-ordinator, Rachael Segal, on "Impact beyond our numbers."

The purpose of the Dec. 21-23 conference was to bring together students involved in smaller Hillels in Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan to collaborate and forge partnerships.

"It's really amazing to see the different types of relationships that have been built through this small-scale convention," said Joseph Tappenden, a 23-year-old, fourth-year accounting student at the Northern Alberta Institute of Technology in Edmonton.

"What's great is that there is now this peer-to-peer network of all these students who can assist each other with feedback and provide each other with trouble-shooting ideas."

Tappenden, who often takes part in events organized by Hillel Edmonton and works for B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) as its Edmonton city supervisor, said that while he enjoyed the lectures and presentations, he benefited even more from the social aspect.

"Being there with people who are similar to me – students who care about the fact that they are Jewish, who care about Israel and they are all there because they want to do something, they want to make a difference – that was my favourite part," Tappenden said.

Benjamin Weinstock, a 19-year old, second-year business student at the University of Manitoba, said that although Hillel members from three provinces were at the conference, it was still very intimate.

He said the message was that Jewish groups from across the prairies can be more effective working together as one large community rather than many smaller ones.

But the message that inspired him the most came from Segal's lecture, titled "Impact beyond our numbers."

During her talk, when she asked the audience if they supported Israel, everyone said they did, Weinstock recalled.

"But then the next question was, 'What do you do to support that?' And pretty much no one answered. That really got me thinking."

Weinstock said it's easy to call yourself a supporter of Israel; but if students aren't vocalizing their support, they won't have an impact on campus culture.

Tappenden said the students were given tools on how to be effective advocates of Israel.

He noted that in Edmonton, there have been a number of boycott Israel campaigns. He recalled when Mountain Equipment Co-op was targeted for selling Israeli made products.

"Of course, Edmonton Hillel had a response to it. We organized a peaceful rally, but... after coming to [the conference], I kind of have a better idea of how to deal with these types of events."

Weinstock added that the presentations and discussions outlined how to use his knowledge in a practical way.

"Instead of just learning about Israel and it being great and everything like that, we learned about the difficulties of presenting that in a public setting," said Weinstock, who serves as a student adviser for BBYO in Winnipeg and often attends events organized by Hillel Winnipeg.

He added that the presenters also encouraged the students to be proud to be Jewish and to have courage of their convictions. "The message was... don't be discouraged by everything else people are saying and be professional about what you're saying."

A beginner's brief guide to Jerusalem

Stav Shapir
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Here, for the beginner, is a very short guide to several locations in the capital of Israel.

Israelis and tourists alike descend upon Jerusalem.

If you don't know where to begin, here, for the beginner tourist, is a short guide to several locations in one of the hottest spots in the Middle East.

One of the most vital and colourful places in Jerusalem is the Mahane Yehuda market, in the centre of town. Here, you can stock up on local fruit and vegetables, gorge on candy to your sweet tooth's content, and devour a fresh plate of hummus to keep you satisfied for hours.

Not only will your taste buds be stimulated in this vivacious market place: the colourful vendors will almost certainly give you a chance to get in touch with the "stereotypical" Israeli – friendly, loud and always willing to haggle. The market is open from dawn to dusk, peaking in adrenaline on Friday afternoons ahead of the Sabbath, when thousands rush to the stalls to stock up on goodies for the weekend.

After your hunger has been satiated and your thirst has been quenched, you should be prepared to brave the Old City for a little taste of Jerusalem's loaded history and religious significance.

The Mahane Yehuda market

Walking down the Via Dolorosa will give you a step-by-step guide to the Christian history in the city of white stone. Later, a stroll through the Armenian Quarter to the Western Wall will offer you the chance to fight for the right to find a crack in Judaism's holiest site in which you can offer up your prayers.

If you have had enough of the hustle and bustle of the city, take a visit to the Israel Museum and check out the unique and grand collection of both local and international art. This museum has works on exhibit ranging from impressionists to modernists and contemporary pieces, as well as a plethora of historical artifacts dating back more than 4,000 years.

When you are finished at the museum, cut across the green parks to check out Israel's Knesset building, whether you want to enjoy the view, or try to get a glimpse of the prime minister making his rounds.

After soaking in so much culture, you might want to grab a good cup of tea or coffee, or a little something sweet.

So, with your sugar levels high, making you feel young and energetic once more, hop across the road to the Nachlaot neighbourhood, a bohemian enclave where students are in the majority. An early evening stroll through those magical alleyways is the perfect way to end a day in Jerusalem.

Chefs gear up for Pesach

Steve K. Walz
Special to The CJN

Even the most famous TV chefs have never experienced the annual challenge of creating a series of kosher for Passover menus at high-end Israeli hotels. The meals must titillate the palates of thousands of visiting guests, while having access to only a limited number of ingredients based on kashrut and halachic considerations. In this respect, Israel's top hotel chefs could be construed as the most innovative culinary artists in the food business!

During the eight-day Passover holiday, thousands of Jewish tourists from the United States, United Kingdom and France flock to elite Israeli hotels to imbibe the fresh springtime air, as well as the pungent aroma of inventive Pesach cooking. There was a time in the not too distant past when Israeli chefs were forced to limit their culinary savoir faire due to the dearth of premium kosher for Passover ingredients.

"New food technologies, which have helped create many quality kosher for Passover products that have been approved by the Tel Aviv Chief Rabbinate (under the stewardship of Rabbi Yisroel Meir Lau), have grown by leaps and bounds since I started working in Israel nearly 13 years ago," said John Donnelly, executive operations chef at Tel Aviv's David InterContinental Hotel.

Donnelly, who had previously worked as a top chef, serving up non-kosher dishes at the five-star luxury InterContinental Mark Hopkins Hotel in San Francisco, Calif., as well as the Ritz-Carlton Hotel in Boston, Mass., has relished the opportunity to create premium kosher cuisine year-round, as well as during Passover.

He added, "The guests who come to our hotel from the United States, United Kingdom, France, etc. for Passover, are so culinary savvy they could go anywhere, because they absolutely know what they like. As our guests have such high expectations when it comes to prime cuisine, we are always trying to go to another culinary level. And today, it is absolutely possible to create unique and delicious dishes during Passover."

Donnelly and his kitchen staff will serve up more than 15,000 individual meals to nearly 1,000 guests during the course of the holiday, including the swanky seder soirees. What are the most popular dishes?

"First of all, I build menus that feature a variety of flavours and tastes. Also, the growing number of high-quality kosher for Passover wines that I can cook with has given us more culinary options," said Donnelly.

"I'm proud to say that the meat products we order from Argentina are phenomenal. We've had guests from the United States and United Kingdom who've asked us where we get such quality meat. The [meat] is as good as anything you'll ever find in the top restaurants in New York or London. Our chicken soup, I think, is absolutely the best. I have a talented Iraqi-Jewish sous chef who makes sure that the soup and other dishes have a consistency of quality."

Sheraton Tel Aviv & Towers, Executive Chef, Charley Fadida at work in the kitchen.

Across town, Sheraton Tel Aviv Hotel & Towers executive chef, Charley Fadida, has garnered a reputation for spearheading a kosher culinary revolution in metro Tel Aviv. The Sheraton Tel Aviv Hotel & Towers Olive Restaurant, which was created to showcase Fadida's talents, has been consistently voted as one of the top five kosher restaurants in Israel by TimeOut Magazine.

"Today, where the hotel's staff is much more personally connected to the customer, it is important for the chef to create a true culinary experience for the guests. In my dining room and restaurant, the orientation on the plate is more a work of art, with lots of colours, which gives you a real appetite," Fadida said.

"In reality, creating menus for Pesach for hundreds of guests is literally like planning the opening of a new restaurant. You have to plan ahead and order products three months in advance, and there is no room for error since suppliers don't stock extra products for the eight days of Pesach. There is no such thing as telling guests, 'we don't have this dish, because it's Pesach.' Today, there's a whole range of new ingredients available, so you can put pastas and tortillas on the menu. I can guarantee that guests who come from the USA and UK this year will be able to eat, and eat , and eat...My specialties include the traditional chicken soup, gefilte fish and tangy North African-style fish dishes."

In Jerusalem, David Citadel Hotel, executive chef, Eric Attias, is tasked with tailoring mouth-watering glatt kosher, non-gebrochts (no matzah meal), non-kitniyot (no legumes) cuisine for the hotel's upscale tourists.

Hotels mindful of guests who watch their calories

"Based on my 13 years of experience at the David Citadel, I have always been able to find new ways to offer delicious gourmet dishes during Pesach, even though I am limited in the types of ingredients I can use," Attias said.

David Citadel Hotel, Executive Chef, Eric Attias whips up something delicious.

"Of course, we are serving great lamb and veal dishes etc. But we have found a real niche with our breakfast and dessert menus. We have been able to create amazing Pesach breakfast pancakes, which are based on crushed almonds. The crushed almonds make the pancakes richer and more tasty. Most importantly, we are renowned for catering to the personal traditions of families who stay with us during Pesach. So if a family requests that their seder table must highlight a certain type of food, we honour those traditions."

A growing number of Israeli hotel chefs are also mindful of guests who like to watch their calories, without feeling the need to compromise on sampling the enticing dishes on the holiday menu.

At the Daniel Hotel in picturesque Herzliya (Tamares Hotels), where most of the visiting Passover clientele also hail from the United Kingdom and United States, executive chef, Dudu Cohen said that he likes to surprise his guests with a variety of European and Mediterranean-style fish entrees, as well as quiches and even pizzas.

"Even though we, of course, serve a selection of meat dishes during the holiday, we realize that our guests don't always like to eat heavy meals all the time," Cohen said. "The fact that we can also offer pizza, pastas, quiches and yes, Passover bagels, because of the new kosher for Passover ingredients that are now available, allows us to make our menus that much more interesting."

Up in northern Israel, at the posh Rimonim Galei Kinneret Hotel, located along the banks of the Sea of Galilee, executive chef Meir Rosenberg tailors a variety of succulent Mehadrin (Glatt Kosher) dishes for guests.

"Years ago it was hard to find a high standard of glatt kosher veal and duck, as well as soup mixes and sauces. Today, it's possible to achieve new culinary peaks during Passover," said Rosenberg.

"The technological advances in Kosher for Passover ingredients also allow us to address the growing number of requests from guests who want a healthier menu featuring gluten-free products, as well as low-sugar pastries. Unfortunately more and more people are suffering from diabetes and celiac disease. With the large variety of gluten-free kosher for Passover products that are now available, I'm able to offer premium culinary solutions for people who have health issues including breads, pastas etc. We have a great interaction with our guests, so we are always prepared to create high quality cuisine based on their dietary desires."

Green is the new tourism

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c

As we become more conscious of the size of our ecological footprints, it's good to know that in Israel we can go green in our leisure options as well.

Ecotourism in the Negev desert is rapidly expanding in parallel with the region's overall development. Zimmerbus, created by Eyal and Avigail Hirshfeld out of old vehicles headed for the scrap heap, is one especially outside-the-box destination.

"The idea came out of need," Eyal Hirshfeld tells Israel21c. "We brought one bus to refurbish as a guest room for friends and family because we didn't have enough space in our house."

The Hirshfelds and their children covered the metal shell with the natural building material adobe (made from sand, clay, water and organic material) and roofed it with date-palm leaves. Inside, it was outfitted with as many natural materials as possible. "People liked the idea and suggested making it into a zimmer," says Hirshfeld.

They purchased and renovated two more buses – one a 'concertina' model large enough for families – and went into business. A recycling system is planned, using wastewater from the zimmerbuses to irrigate an organic garden, along with an organic vineyard.

The abundance of 'green' lodgings, organic eateries, biking and hiking trails, bird-watching sites, ecological study tours, and more, made Israel the perfect host for the fall's ecotourism conference sponsored by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD).

The greening of Israel's tourism industry is an ongoing priority, according to Tourism Minister Stas Misezhnikov.

The ministry's dedicated and informative site, Travelgreenisrael.com, complements its two-year promotion, 'Israel: One Hundred Years of Green.' The campaign is marked by a series of projects in co-operation with Eco & Sustainable Tourism Israel, the Nature and Parks Authority, Jewish National Fund, and the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel.

For both domestic and foreign travellers, green accommodation in Israel varies from campgrounds to desert huts, to upscale resorts offering natural therapies and healthful cuisine.

One of the newest arrivals to the ecotourism scene is Zohar Katzir's Essene Farm in Even-Sappir, a small mountaintop village just west of Jerusalem.

In a few months, Katzir will open guest lodges roofed with recycled tiles, insulated with thick straw bales, and connected to biological purification pools for waste.

Meanwhile, guests arrive on a daily basis to learn natural personal hygiene and organic and 'permaculture' gardening techniques, and to explore the forest and springs below. "We wish to see people developing spiritually through love, and work closer to Mother Nature," Katzir says.

Tuesday evenings, Essene serves up raw-food cuisine in its mud-and-straw main building outfitted with a grey-water purification pond and a water-free compost commode.

Some of Israel's green lodging options, such as Essene Farm and Herzliya's energy-conserving Sharon Resort Hotel, are close to major population centres. Others are more rural, such as Cabins in the Mist in the Golan Heights, with its hand-built, 'technology-free' wooden cabins surrounded by organic cherry orchards.

While ecotourist facilities are popping up all over the Negev Desert and the Arava, in the Great Rift Valley, most are situated in Israel's lush Galilee region.

Two of the many Upper Galilee eco-resorts are Vered HaGalil, where guests can experience alternative therapies such as reiki and energy healing, and the Schnabel Zimmer (country inn), an award-winning site featuring five cabins in a permaculture environment with an accompanying vegetable garden, goat pen and chicken coop.

In the Western Galilee, there's Back to Nature via the Bible, an ecological village offering opportunities to learn about medicinal plants and herbs, stomping grapes, grinding grain, and crushing olives for oil.

In the Negev, ecotourists can stay at the Zimmerbus, a unique guest room made out of buses destined for the scrap heap.

And at Indigo Guest House, an environmentally mindful bed and breakfast, you'll be served meals from locally grown organic ingredients irrigated with recycled grey water from the lodges.

One of the Lower Galilee's niche ecotourist spots is the HooHa Cyclists House. Here, accommodations and services are geared specifically to those touring Israel atop two-wheelers.

Israel will be attractive destination for cyclists

And there are bound to be many more of these as the Tourism Ministry begins investing more than NIS 100 million in a 3,000-mile network of new bike paths, including a national trail. Two major cycling paths near and around Lake Kinneret (Sea of Galilee) are under construction.

"This infrastructure will also make Israel an attractive destination for cyclists from around the world and a marketing program will be prepared accordingly," Misezhnikov recently announced.

Adventurous 'voluntourists' who want to explore the country's ecosystem through an organized program have several options. GoEco, established in 2005, offers a large selection of projects from coral reef conservation in the Red Sea and eco-building in the Arava to wildlife conservation at a biblical nature reserve.

At Kibbutz Lotan in the Arava, voluntourists are housed in straw-bale-and-mud geodesic domes and accompany kibbutzniks in tasks such as organic gardening, alternative/natural building, maintaining nature trails, arranging educational workshops, and working in the Lotan migratory bird reserve.

Ecologically-minded day trips are another option as Israel invests in new projects such as Ayalon Park's 75-acre recycling plant atop a former garbage dump near Tel Aviv. Visitors can watch as household and industrial refuse, garden debris and corrugated paper is transformed into electricity, and as irrigation and washing water is cleaned. In the Visitors Center decorated with recycled art, kids can take part in hands-on workshops.

The Tourism Ministry has invested millions of shekels since the early 1990s in the development of a tourist infrastructure at Lake Agmon in the northern Hula Valley, a critical region for migrating birds and other wildlife. Most recently, the Ministry and Jewish National Fund each invested NIS 700,000 (about $194,000) to construct a southern observation point on the lake. This newest eco-tourist attraction is expected to open within a few months.

Butterflies to Bat Yam

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c

Butterflies are arriving in great colourful swarms to Israel's Mediterranean city of Bat Yam. They are attraced to 150,000 new plants brought to town by the chief municipal landscaper, Eliav Hatuka. The beautiful insects are an indication of a healthy environment, since they avoid polluted places.

"Where there's clean air, they come," Hatuka says. "It's nice to see how the number and quality of the butterflies increase as you get farther from the highways and closer to the shore."

The notion of transforming Bat Yam, a relatively poor tightly packed city just south of Tel Aviv, into Israel's first natural butterfly city started with Hatuka's summer 2008 family outing to Ramat Hanadiv, a memorial park in the northern town of Zichron Ya'acov that includes a small butterfly garden.

Thinking along the lines of one small butterfly garden, he consulted with Dubi Benyamini, head of the Israeli Lepidopterists Society for butterfly and moth enthusiasts, whose English website should be ready in the near future. Benyamini recommended taking a survey to ascertain which butterflies already existed in the area – it turned up 13 species – and planting numerous gardens of butterfly-attracting plants along Bat Yam's east-west boulevards starting from the beachfront.

"These tracks will become butterflies ecological corridors," Benyamini recalls predicting then.

Sure enough, aromatic plants such as verbena, cassia, lantana, sophora, duranta, and ruda soon started attracting lots of butterflies – now 21 species in all – including the common swallowtail,

"When there's clean air, they come," says Bat Yam chief municipal landscaper Eliav Hatuka.

one of the largest and most beautiful butterflies in Israel; and the large white-yellow African migrant.

"There was not even one known [cassia] plant in Bat Yam, but when Eliav's gardeners started to plant it, the strong migrant smelled it and not more than two weeks later I observed the first eggs on the plants in southern Bat Yam," says Benyamini.

"This butterfly has expanded all over the city and the mild winter supports its permanent existence here." He believes more species will follow their noses to Bat Yam as well.

Encouraged by this success, Mayor Shlomi Lahiani gave the green light for spending about NIS1 million to purchase butterfly-attracting plants and to construct a butterfly pavilion in the city nursery where visitors can learn about the insects and their significance in taking the ecological temperature of the city.

The Bat Yam Butterfly Experiment, the first of its kind in Israel, was formally introduced during Bat Yam's September Biennale celebrating landscape urbanism and expansion of the city's open areas and cultural life.

"All year we're planting anyway, so we just had to make a switch to buy plants that butterflies love," says Hatuka.

"It looks complicated, but it's not. We built a route of gardens close to each other so the butterflies can flutter here and there." In co-operation with local businesses, the municipality also sells plants at a low cost to Bat Yam's 160,000 residents. "We try to let the community take part in the experience."

During the biennale, local mother and journalist Nili Shahar opened an educational butterfly pavilion in a 115-by-33-foot tomato hothouse, where visitors fed butterflies from nectar-dipped sticks and explored museum displays about many kinds of insects. So far, the pavilion has attracted four species of butterflies and a whole lot of schoolchildren.

Eventually, Shahar hopes to hand out "butterfly flower" seed packets for the kids to take home. Trained through an International Butterfly Breeders Association course in Costa Rica, Shahar loves introducing children to the insect world. "I see the butterflies as an excuse to open their hearts and minds to all the small creatures in the world," she says. "I want to expose them to other creatures like beetles and to learn about their lifecycles."

Though Bat Yam's project is the largest of its type, butterflies are being wooed in other spots as well, such as a butterfly pavilion at Kibbutz Bachan's Utopia Orchid Park.

Mubarak reaches out to the opposition

Anshel Pfeffer and Avi Isacharoff
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak instructed his government to begin talks with opposition parties who support the mass anti-government protests across the country, the pan-Arab satellite network Al-Arabiya reported Monday.

Mubarak told his new prime minister, Ahmed Shafiq, to start talking to the opposition to find out their specific demands.

On Monday afternoon, more than 250,000 protesters had gathered again in Cairo's Tahrir Square, as well as in main centres of other Egyptian cities.

Protesters called for an indefinite general strike and said they were planning a "million man march" for Tuesday to mark one week since the start of anti-government protests.

Egyptian military officers and soldiers promised Monday that they would not hurt any of the protesters in Tuesday's march.

An officer in Egypt's Signal Corps, who identified himself as Maj. Ahmed, said he was responsible for the deployment of troops in central Cairo and that the army would not touch the Egyptian people.

"We are with the people, and they love us. We will never hurt the people," he said. When asked what orders the military received from the government, he said: "We don't know what is going on with the government."

Protesters were camped out in central Cairo on Monday and vowed to stay until they had toppled Mubarak, whose fate appeared dependent on the military as pressure mounted from the street and abroad.

"The army has to choose between Egypt and Mubarak," read one banner in Cairo's Tahrir Square, where demonstrators shared food with soldiers sent to restore order after violent protests shook Mubarak's 30-year rule to its core.

At dawn, some hardy demonstrators from the night before were still in the square, which was covered in early-morning mist. They had already begun chants of "Down, Down, Mubarak".

Six days of unrest have killed more than 100 people, but the two sides reached a stalemate. Protesters refused to go, while the army was not moving them. The longer protesters stayed unchallenged, the more untenable Mubarak's position seemed.

Protesters in Tahrir Square – the epicentre of the earthquake that has sent shudders through the Middle East and among global investors – dismissed Mubarak's appointment of military men as his vice-president and prime minister.

His promises of economic reform to address public anger at rising prices, unemployment and the huge gap between rich and poor failed to halt their broader calls for the ouster of Mubarak and his associates.

The protesters have been pressing their demands for democracy, which could spell the end for the military establishment that has run post-colonial Egypt since the 1950s.

The United States, which has poured billions of dollars of aid into Egypt since Mubarak came to power, stopped just short of saying openly that it wanted its ally out. Officials, including President Barack Obama and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, spoke about "an orderly transition."

A senior U.S. administration official, who declined to be identified, said the feeling among Obama's national security aides was that Mubarak's time had passed, but it was up to Egyptians to determine what happens next.

Mubarak, a former air force chief, has turned to his military commanders, meeting them on Sunday. They seem to hold his future in their hands. Egypt's defence minister spoke by phone to U.S. Defence Secretary Robert Gates on Sunday.

Admiral Mike Mullen, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the highest-ranking U.S. military officer, praised the "professionalism" of Egypt's armed forces as its troops refrained from a crackdown on protesters. Egypt receives about $1.3 billion a year in U.S. military aid.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak

Meanwhile, Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon issued a statement Jan. 27, saying that "Canada regrets the loss of life of both protesters and police officers during political demonstrations in Egypt. We urge all parties to refrain from violence, and, in particular, we urge the Egyptian authorities to respond to these protests peacefully."

He added: "Canada calls on all parties to remain calm and to continue to respect freedom, democracy, human rights and the rule of law. We call on the government of Egypt to ensure that freedom of expression is respected by, among other measures, unblocking Internet sites.

"Egypt remains an important partner for Canada, and we urge the Egyptian government to ensure full freedom of political expression for its citizens."

In related developments, Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-president of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, called Mohammed ElBaradei, the opposition leader emerging from the Egyptian ferment, a "stooge of Iran."

Hoenlein accused ElBaradei of covering up Iran's true nuclear weaponization capacities while he directed the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the UN nuclear watchdog.

"He is a stooge of Iran, and I don't use the term lightly," Hoenlein said in an online interview with the Yeshiva World News, a website, on the Egyptian crisis.

Netanyahu urges criticism of Mubarak be curbed

Barak Ravid
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Protests against Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's rule have worried Israel, which signed a peace treaty with its largest Arab ally in 1979, and uncertainty over Egypt's future has raised fears about stability in the region.

Israel called on the United States and a number of European countries over the weekend to curb their criticism of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, in order to preserve that stability.

Jerusalem seeks to convince its allies that it is in the West's interest to maintain the stability of the Egyptian regime. The diplomatic measures came after statements released in western capitals implied that the United States and the European Union (EU) supported Mubarak's ouster.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he spoke with U.S. President Barack Obama and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton Saturday night, after which he held consultations with Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, and senior intelligence officials.

Israeli officials are keeping a low profile on the events in Egypt, with Netanyahu even ordering cabinet members to avoid commenting publicly on the issue.

Senior Israeli officials, however, said that on Saturday night, the Foreign Ministry issued a directive to around a dozen key embassies in the United States, Canada, China, Russia and several European countries. The ambassadors were told to stress to their host countries the importance of Egypt's stability. In a special cable, they were told to get this word out as soon as possible.

EU foreign ministers were to discuss the Egypt situation at a special session Monday in Brussels, after which they were expected to issue a statement echoing those issued in recent days by Obama and Clinton.

Obama called on Mubarak to take "concrete steps" toward democratic reforms and to refrain from violence against peaceful protesters, sentiments echoed in a statement Saturday night by the leaders of Britain, France and Germany.

"The Americans and the Europeans are being pulled along by public opinion and aren't considering their genuine interests," one senior Israeli official said. "Even if they are critical of Mubarak, they have to make their friends feel that they're not alone. Jordan and Saudi Arabia see the reactions in the West, how everyone is abandoning Mubarak, and this will have very serious implications."

Netanyahu told his cabinet Sunday that Israel must exercise responsibility and restraint in the face of the unrest in Egypt, and that Jerusalem's primary concern was to preserve the more than 30 years of stability and peaceful ties with Cairo.

"The peace between Israel and Egypt has lasted for more than three decades, and our objective is to ensure that these relations will continue to exist," he told his ministers. "We are closely monitoring events in Egypt and the region and are making efforts to preserve its security and stability."

Netanyahu announced at the cabinet meeting that the security cabinet would convene Monday to discuss the situation in Egypt.

He has also repeated his request for ministers to refrain from further comment on the situation in Egypt.

The Foreign Ministry has called on Israelis currently in Egypt to consider returning home, and for those planning to visit the country to reconsider. It is telling Israelis who have decided to remain in Egypt to obey government directives.

Opinions

Cairo tremors will be felt in Israel

Amos Harel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The events of the past few days in Egypt – seemingly the most important development in the region since the Islamic revolution in Iran and the Israeli-Egyptian peace accord in 1979 – represent a nightmare to Israeli intelligence leaders and planners. While many other countries view the possible ouster of a government that denies basic rights to its citizens with satisfaction, the Israeli point of view is completely different.

The collapse of the old regime in Cairo, if it takes place, will have a tremendous influence, mostly negative, on Israel's situation. In the long run, it threatens to endanger peace with Egypt and Jordan, the greatest of Israel's strategic assets after U.S. support. It is likely to bring about changes in the Israel Defence Forces and worsen the Israeli economy.

Israeli intelligence, like most of the West, did not foresee the force of the turnabout (the conclusive epithet "revolution" will have to wait, it seems).

Like Israeli intelligence, the overwhelming majority of media pundits and academic experts were also mistaken. While the intelligence services did depict 2011 as a year of possible regime changes in Egypt and Saudi Arabia, accompanied by unpredictable results, it did not forecast a popular uprising.

Furthermore, the new head of intelligence, Gen. Aviv Kochavi, at his first appearance before the Knesset foreign affairs and defense committee on Jan. 26, said that "there is no concern at the moment about the stability of the Egyptian government." That same day Egyptians took to the streets.

By the end of the week, the midnight oil was burning at intelligence headquarters. The main questions of the coming days are about what Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and the army will decide to do.

Mubarak, who suffers from cancer and whose health has been worsening recently, faces a dilemma reminiscent of the bind Tehran found itself in with the "Green Revolution" of 2009.

However, while the ayatollahs in the end used unrestrained force, the elderly Egyptian president must decide whether he wants his 30-year rule to be remembered for a bloodbath near its end.

Yet by Monday, the number of deaths among demonstrators had climbed to above 100.

The army was called out to the streets of large cities on Sunday in order to spell the exhausted police force. The soldiers, unlike the police, have no means to disperse demonstrators. If they receive orders to shoot, it will be live fire, and thousands of people will be killed.

Is the army still loyal to the president? Dozens of tanks that streamed into central Cairo bore graffiti that read "Mubarak will fall" – sprayed on by demonstrators.

Israeli suspicions about the functioning of the American administration in the Middle East, which began with U.S. President Barack Obama's speech at a Cairo university 18 months ago, have now turned to astonishment at the stammering coming out of Washington over the last few days.

Here, too, the precedent is Iranian. Like president Jimmy Carter facing the shah's ouster, Obama hesitates between supporting a loyal but tyrannical ally and the basic American instinct in favour of a popular struggle for freedom.

And like Carter the Democrat, Obama too favours the second option. The Israeli suspicion is that under the surface of the Egyptian struggle, which is on the face about economics and democracy, lies an Islamic element. Islamists are not yet pulling strings and making plans, but they will be the first to recover and exploit the confusion to attract followers.

The fall of the Mubarak government, father and son, will have far-reaching security consequences for Israel. It will immediately damage Israel's quiet co-operation with the Egyptians on this front, and it may lead to a thaw between Egypt and the Hamas government in Gaza.

It could damage the status of the international peacekeeping force in Sinai and lead to a refusal by Egypt to allow movement of Israeli military submarines and ships in the Suez Canal, employed in the last two years as a deterrent against Iran and to combat weapons smuggling from Sudan to Gaza.

In the long run, if a radical government achieves power, rather than a variation of the current one, there is likely to be a real freeze in the already cold peace with Israel.

Austrian restitution funds help Jews persecuted by Nazis

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Two restitution funds established by Austria to make amends for its role in the Nazi-era persecution of Austrian Jews in the period before and during the Holocaust have compensated thousands of claimants and their descendants around the world.

The National Fund of the Republic of Austria for Victims of National Socialism, as well as the General Settlement Fund for Victims of National Socialism, have discharged Austria's "moral responsibility" to the tune of almost $400 million so far.

Hannah Lessing

As of Dec. 31, 2010, the National Fund had processed more than 26,000 claims for various property losses. Each claimant was entitled to a lump sum "gesture" payment of $7,000 (US). The fund has thus paid out about $200 million.

Due to social need, 409 claimants received a second payment, while 77 recipients received a third payment, thereby raising the overall figure.

Established in 1995, the National Fund recognizes claims by people who were citizens of Austria before it was annexed by Nazi Germany in 1938 and who were persecuted on the basis of religion, ethnicity, nationality, sexual orientation or physical or mental handicaps.

By the end of last year, the General Settlement Fund had distributed about $173 (US) million to more than 19,000 applicants, heirs and co-heirs living in some 75 countries.

Claimants in Canada accounted for 2.7 per cent of the payments, an Austrian government spokesperson said.

The General Settlement Fund was created in 2001 under the Washington Agreement, which compensates Holocaust survivors for stolen property and assets.

"We still have a lot of work to do," Hannah Lessing, secretary general of both funds, said in an interview. "We remain at the service of the survivors."

Kantor calls on EU to fight antisemitism

JTA

BRUSSELS — With antisemitism on the rise more than six decades after the liberation of Auschwitz, Europe should be fighting harder against hate, Moshe Kantor said.

Kantor, president of the European Jewish Congress, who spoke in Brussels last week at a Holocaust remembrance ceremony hosted by the EU Parliament, brought this message personally to Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orbán, current president of the EU Council.

Moshe Kantor

According to Kantor, who organized the Holocaust remembrance event, the two met earlier in the day to discuss how to deal with Hungary's antisemitic, far-right Jobbik party, as well as Orbán's controversial new media watchdog law, which critics consider anti-democratic.

Dina Porat, head of the new Kantor Center for the Study of Contemporary European Jewry in Tel Aviv, said antisemitism is particularly problematic in western Europe, which has a larger Muslim population than the central and eastern European countries.

"Most of them want to live their lives like anyone else," she told JTA. But the radicals among them tend to pick up Christian antisemitic motifs. "And in democratic countries, where you have media freedom, such propaganda can proliferate," Porat said.

Democratic countries cannot afford to be "tolerant of intolerance," Kantor said, adding that Europe should have "zero tolerance" for antisemitism.

"The European Union can fight it," said World Jewish Congress President Ronald Lauder, addressing several hundred people at the ceremony. "Every time someone says something antisemitic, we should stand up and fight back."

Holocaust survivors and the son of a rescuer were among those to join in the ceremony, which also featured remarks by EU Parliament President Jerzy Buzek, former prime minister of Poland; Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, chairman of Yad Vashem, and Yuri Edelstein, Israeli minister of public diplomacy and Diaspora affairs.

Israel Briefs

Hamas mulls Schalit deal

A delegation of Hamas strongmen was to discuss in Damascus the latest proposal for a prisoner exchange for the release of Gilad Schalit, the London-based newspaper Al-Hayat reported last Friday. The paper reported that the German mediator in the Schalit talks, Gerhard Conrad, concluded a two-day visit to the Gaza Strip earlier in January and held talks with senior Hamas leaders. A top Hamas official said at the time that Conrad presented a series of new ideas to Hamas in a renewed effort to reach a deal with Israel over a prisoner swap that would free the Israeli soldier after more than four years in Palestinian captivity.

Ancient tunnel dig complete

The Israel Antiquities Authority announced last week that it had completed the excavation of an ancient tunnel that runs from the City of David in eastern Jerusalem to near the Temple Mount. Some Palestinians believe the project is an attempt to damage the Al Aqsa Mosque. Previous archeological projects in the area have led to rioting by Palestinians. Travellers making pilgrimages to Jerusalem some 2,000 years ago used the road in the tunnel, according to the authority. It was discovered during excavations on a water channel used for drainage during the Second Temple period. Work on the tunnel took seven years, including a year's delay after the Israeli Supreme Court ordered work halted while it considered a petition by residents of the eastern Jerusalem neighbourhood of Silwan, who claimed the dig was damaging their homes. The stop-work order was lifted in September 2009. No opening has been made on the tunnel near the Temple Mount, though one is planned. The tunnel does not run under the Temple Mount.

New flotillas to head to Gaza

Two more flotillas will try to break Israel's blockade of Gaza, organizers said. The new convoys, organized by the Free Gaza movement and the Turkish pro-Palestinian group IHH, will leave in the spring and have been dubbed Freedom Flotilla 2, according to reports. "We have at least 15 different groups right now at one or two boats each," Huwaida Arraf, chair of the Free Gaza Movement, told the Washington Times about the new flotillas. The groups organized the May 31 flotilla that resulted in the deaths of nine Turkish activists. The Turkel Commission in Israel that investigated the incident found that Israel's blockade of Gaza is legal according to international law and that Israeli soldiers acted in self-defence when they fired on activists aboard the Turkish ship the Mavi Marmara.

El Al's strategic vision for growth includes Toronto

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

For observers of the airline business in Israel, it appears things are getting a little more complicated than they need be.

In recent years, the U.S. Federal Aviation Authority ranked Israel's air safety as poor and downgraded it to Category 2, a ranking shared by Third World countries. An internal Israeli watchdog called on the government to address several issues, including outdated technology, runways that are too short, crowded air space and a dysfunctional civil aviation authority.

Meanwhile, at the bargaining table, the union representing Israeli pilots has stated in no uncertain terms that it rejects calls that its members take the International Civil Aviation Organization English-language competency test, even though failure to do so could mean pilots will lose their accreditation and be prevented from flying overseas.

Reasons to worry? Not according to Elyezer Shkedy, president and CEO of El Al Israel Airlines. During a visit to the airline's Toronto office, the Israel-based CEO was all smiles. Not to worry, Shkedy says. Israeli authorities will get around to addressing the infrastructure issues. "A lot of people are working on it," he said. And the pilots' "no" should be seen in the context of tough negotiations. Nothing more. That issue too will be resolved, he predicted.

Shkedy, who was accompanied in his brief Canadian visit by former Canadian general manager Stanley Morais, who made aliyah and is working for the airline in Israel, is optimistic about the airline's prospects. Last year was a banner year for Israeli tourism, with Ben-Gurion International Airport serving 3.5 million tourists and an equal number of Israeli travellers. El Al had a big chunk of that market, he said.

Israel is becoming even more of a must-see destination for international visitors, and El Al is ramping up to meet that demand, he said. Since he took over as head of the airline in January 2010, he has set his sights on developing new markets and expanding existing ones. Shkedy believes there is tremendous opportunity and room to grow in the North American market, including Toronto. There is also a lot of upside in relatively new markets in the BRIC countries – Brazil, Russia, India and China.

His Canadian visit included a trip to Calgary, where he met with officials of WestJet. El Al is negotiating with that carrier to conclude an "interline" agreement. Such a contract would be a "win-win" for both airlines, Shkedy said. It would permit Canadians travelling to Israel from across the country to book a flight through Toronto with a single ticket and without rechecking baggage at Pearson airport, he said.

Shkedy is hopeful the arrangement could be concluded this year, before the High Holidays. And since the agreement does not have quite the impact of a codeshare – "it's like living together rather than getting married," said El Al's Canadian general manager Dinah Kutner – it won't be affected by the airport downgrade in Israel, he said.

(Category 2 ranking prevents El Al from entering new codeshares – an agreement in which an airline buys space on another airline and markets the extra space as its own – with American airlines.)

Building on his strategic vision, Shkedy said El Al has entered an interline agreement with JetBlue, as well as codeshares with Russian and Chinese airlines. He has met with colleagues in Brazil and India as well.

Overall, 2010 was a pretty good year for the airline, which was privatized six years ago. According to the company's third-quarter financial results, the latest available, "the company's revenues grew by 13 per cent and totalled $561.2 million, compared to $496.1 million in the parallel period last year [2009]. Net profit grew by 245 per cent and totalled $42.5 million compared to $12.3 million in the parallel period last year."

Other significant data included a small drop in load factor (a measure of how full planes are), which reached 83.8 per cent, down from 85.1 per cent the year before. That compared to an overall figure for all foreign airlines arriving at Ben-Gurion Airport of 81.4 per cent.

Shkedy was coy when asked if the Toronto-Tel Aviv route was a money maker. "We are working on it," he said. "We are improving our routes all the time. I think Toronto is a high potential route."

Years ago, the Toronto route was problematic and Morais, when he was the general manager, said he had to contend with suggestions from head office that the route should be scrapped altogether.

Shkedy, however, is taking head office in a different direction. "Given I came here specially to Canada, I think Canada is part of North America and Toronto is important. I decided to add flights in the summer of 2011. There will be five flights [a week] in the summer, up from four. As a concept, I believe we should be here."

Although Israel experienced a record year for tourism in 2010 – and that included unprecedented number of Canadian visitors – Shkedy is convinced there is plenty of room to grow. Israel remains a relatively undiscovered travel destination, he said.

"It is the most fascinating place on earth," he enthused. "You can go scuba diving in the Red Sea, visit the lowest point on earth at the Dead Sea, see the Sea of Galilee, see desert, snow, Jerusalem with 3,000 years of history, Tel Aviv with its nightlife and religious heritage sites. From a tourism point of view, it really is something. Objectively, Israel is fascinating."

As if to reciprocate the interest, Israelis, said Shkedy, "would like to come to Canada. The country, the people, nature, its beauty are something people from Israel know and they would like to be here."

As of 2010, El Al carried 1.9 million passengers a year between 37 destinations. The company operates 39 aircraft, 27 of which are self-owned. Shkedy said part of his strategic plan is to upgrade the airline's fleet with newer planes.

CD mixes original songs and jazz standards

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Singer-songwriter Francine Hailman's debut CD of original and standard jazz tunes, Love Is Here, was produced by Juno Award-winning jazz guitarist Tony Quarrington.

Quarrington also performs on the CD, along with top jazz players Robi Botos, Tom Skublics, Igor Romanyk, Scott Kemp, Nick Fraser and Denis Keldie.

"My songs are a reflection of hope, pain and joy," says Hailman. "They are about preserving love through the celebration of music. The inspiration for my lyrics comes intuitively, and sometimes from observing people or when listening to others' stories."

Sometimes when a lyric or melody has come to her, she has phoned her own voicemail to record it for a future time, when she can develop it into a song.

Love Is Here includes a mix of eight standards and eight original songs.

"I originally wanted to do an all-original album, but my producer, Tony Quarrington, suggested we needed to include standards, so we made a master list of tunes that would be a great fit for the album. It was very important for me to have an array of different musical milieus for future listeners to enjoy, so we incorporated swing, Latin, jazz and blues."

Hailman and Quarrington took a month to narrow down the selection of songs and decide the order in which they will be heard on the CD, so the music would flow just right.

"It was so amazing to hear the transformation of song to incredible instrumentation arrangements, and to the final recording," Hailman says.

One of her favourite original tracks on the CD, A Woman's Heart, is a song written from a woman's point of view that gives advice to men on how to treat women.

"What really excites me about this CD is its diversity," she says. "It is a musical expression because of the emotional and unforgettable strong melodies of the standards and my originals that stay with you long after you've listened to each tune," she says.

Hailman comes from a musical family – her mother sang Yiddish songs to her as a child– and she started playing classical piano when she was eight. As a child, she developed a passion for singing old-style jazz tunes from the 1920s, '30s and '40s. Her early Jewish influences included singers such as the Barry Sisters and Barbra Streisand. Her non-Jewish influences included Lena Horne and Billie Holiday.

Hailman is a passionate cook and, at one time arranged a swap with singer Louise Lambert – vocal lessons for Hailman's gourmet cooking.

She is married and has four children. She performs every other Thursday in Thornhill, at Ferraro 502 North, until the end of March.

"Performing and singing allows me to contribute to the lives of many people. I see it when they listen, there is a smile, a nod, when they sing along, sway their heads or when they get up and dance... the non-verbal communications speak volumes to me," she says.

A portion of the CD's proceeds are going to the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada, a disease the entertainer has been diagnosed with herself.

For more information on Hailman or to purchase her CD, visit, www.francine-hailman.com.

Her CD launch takes place at Chalker's Pub, 247 Marlee Ave., Toronto, on Feb. 10 at 7 p.m. 416-789-2531.

Film star Liane Balaban makes her stage debut

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

If it wasn't for a Passover dinner, Torontonian Liane Balaban, 30, may have never become an actor in an acclaimed Canadian movie and gone on to appear in Hollywood feature films.

Balaban met producer Julia Sereny at a relative's seder. Sereny invited Balaban – who had studied drama in high school but had no plans to pursue acting as a profession – to audition for the lead role in the 1999 film, New Waterford Girl, which she was producing. Balaban landed the role and went on to garner a Special Jury Citation at the 24th annual Toronto International Film Festival for her performance.

After acting in movies for more than 10 years, Balaban is now making her stage debut in Necessary Angel's Divisadero: a performance, at Theatre Passe Muraille's Mainspace.

Balaban, who's been living in Los Angeles, has come back home to star as Claire in Michael Ondaatje's adaptation of his Governor General's Award-winning novel Divisadero, directed by the company's artistic director, Daniel Brooks.

Balaban considers it a great privilege to be able to work closely with both Brooks and Ondaatje, who's perhaps best known for writing The English Patient. She met Brooks through his brother, Adam, who wrote and directed Definitely, Maybe, a Universal Pictures film in which she acted.

"One of the most amazing things about working on this project is that I get to be part of the process of creating the play itself with Michael and Daniel because it is a brand-new work," she says.

"Being in a play is something I have always wanted to do. I never went to theatre school or had that experience of being in a play that every other single actor I've ever worked with has. I knew it would be amazing to explore a character and a script so in depth over such a long period of time because in film and TV the process is really accelerated. So, I wanted to have that chance to go deeper."

The play pools music, performance and storytelling. "Divisadero is the story of a family growing up on a farm in California, which gets ripped apart by tragedy and what happens in the aftermath of that event," Balaban says.

"It is about a woman looking back on her life, telling the story of what happened [and] the question is, is she telling the truth or is it her fabrication? I play Claire, one of the sisters in the family that lives on the farm."

Liane Balaban

Balaban hopes the story will move audiences. "One of the themes of the play is drawn from a Nietzsche quote, 'We have art so that we shall not be destroyed by the truth.' Art saves us and heals us, so if the audience is moved or touched by this piece of art in some way that is a triumph."

The cast also includes Maggie Huculak, Tom McCamus, Amy Rutherford and Justin Rutledge, a Juno-nominated musician who composed the music for the production.

Balaban has been seen in many films, including Last Chance Harvey, starring Dustin Hoffman; Seven Times Lucky, Saint Jude, World Traveler, The Trotsky and One Week, and on television in the CBC miniseries Above & Beyond, and in St. Urbain's Horseman. She has an Internet show aimed at tweens, Cranky Town, produced with the National Film Board of Canada,

The play Divisadero: a performance runs from Feb. 8 to 20 at Theatre Passe Muraille, 416-504-7529, or visit www.necessaryangel.com.

Ethnic TV entrepreneur brings the world to Canada

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Slava Levin, the chief executive officer of Ethnic Channels Group Ltd., the only Canadian company that brings multiple language programming to Canada's diverse population, has a simple yet compelling broadcast philosophy.

"I want to bring the world to Canada," he said.

Levin, an immigrant himself, has been bringing international programs to viewers in Canada for the past six years. He licenses content from a host of countries – including Russia, Israel, Egypt, Greece, Germany and Pakistan – and distributes it on 36 channels through providers like Rogers Cable, Telus, Shaw, Bell TV and MTS.

Ethnic Channels Group, based in a 10,000-square-foot-plus facility in northern Toronto, distributes foreign programming, from news and current affairs to general entertainment and sports, to hundreds of thousands of subscribers in Canada and the United States.

In compliance with regulations mandated by the CRTC – the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission – it also produces local content. And since 2008, Ethnic Channels Group, a media sponsor of Al Jazeera English, has offered an Internet television service, NexTV.

"We're truly a multicultural company in a multicultural country," said Levin, 42, who was born in Kiev, Ukraine, and immigrated to Canada with his parents, Israel (Izzy) and Paulina, in 1976.

The Levins arrived in Canada, settling first in Hamilton, at a time when emigration from the former Soviet Union was severely restricted. Israel Levin, a typewriter repair man who's now 62, wanted to leave Ukraine so that his son would have a better future.

Originally intending to immigrate to Israel, he changed his mind during a nine-month layover in Italy. Once in Canada, he would play an integral role in his career.

A graduate of Newtonbrook Secondary School in Toronto, Levin studied business and marketing at George Brown College and then architecture at Humber College.

But after graduating, he was unable to find a suitable job. "The market was down, the competition was tough," explained Levin, who was then a bachelor. "I wouldn't have been able to support myself."

Having noticed that there were no video rental stores in his neighbourhood in Richmond Hill, he opened a shop, Moving Pictures Video, and ran it for three years. "I did pretty well until jumbo video outlets came along. It was hard to compete with them."

Around this juncture, Israel Levin, a big fan of Russian TV, bought a satellite dish. After figuring out how to hook it up to a satellite, he watched Russian shows at home. Sensing an opportunity, Israel printed flyers advertising his services. The response from the Russian community was positive. "Our phone didn't stop ringing," said Levin, who together with his father began installing satellite dishes in Russian homes.

Taking the idea one step further in the mid-1990s, Levin established International Satellite Antenae Services, which won the rights to distribute Russian-language programming in Canada. "It was an immediate success," he recalled. "The Russian community was starving for content from Russia."

Back then, 30,000 Russian families, nearly all Jewish, lived in Toronto and environs, compared to 80,000 families, about half of which are Jewish today.

Levin then approached NTV, a Russian state channel, and won the right to distribute its programs in Canada and the United States and, later, in Israel, Australia and Germany. As NTV's chief operating officer in North America, he travelled every other week. "I was tired of the travelling. I'm probably the only guy who ever went to Australia for one day."

Having launched NTV world-wide, Levin, now married and a father, was ready to try something new. In 2004, he launched Ethnic Channels Group, renovating a Royal Bank space he turned into offices and studios.

Slava Levin and his father, Israel

His rationale was clear.

"I realized Canada was still virgin territory for ethnic TV. There were a handful of providers – Chinese, Italian, Greek, South Asian – but the market was basically untapped. I knew there was an opportunity. I had done my homework. If I didn't do it, someone else would. I was in the right place at the right time."

Levin's analysis was spot on. Consider the math. Canada today is home to 32 ethnic groups with a population of more than 100,000. The population of 10 of these communities is one million or more.

For Levin, therefore, the future seems exceedingly bright. According to Statistics Canada, one-third of Canadians will be members of a visible minority by 2031.

Levin has two partners, Gregory Antimony, his old boss at NTV, and Oleg Masliy, who joined him with "open arms and open wallets."

They have some 40 employees, representing a rainbow of nationalities, and depend on three streams of revenue: subscription fees, advertising and technical support services

Though Levin's father is not officially employed by the company, he comes in once in a while as a volunteer "to make sure we're doing our jobs. He has helped me build this business."

Levin, in part at least, owes his success to his network of contacts in Toronto's ethnic communities.

"It's hard to get into this field," said Levin, a car buff who has owned 20 cars in the last decade. "A lot of it is based on relationships, rapport and trust. You have been entrusted with preserving content, not defacing it with your own agenda or political views. If I do something wrong, there are repercussions."

Careful not to broadcast offensive content, he believes in free speech as long as it does not incite violence or ethnic tensions. "Generally, we stay out of the political scene," he said.

He agreed to carry Al Jazeera English because it is "very different" from its Arabic counterpart, which has been accused of being anti-Israel.

Looking ahead, Levin hopes to expand Russian, Greek and South Asian programming. "We want to add value to them," he said.

He has applied for another Israeli channel and has won CRTC approval for Jewish Life TV, which was only available in the United States until now.

Ethnic cleansing in the bloodlands

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Political mass murder and ethnic cleansing were two of the ugly leitmotifs of the dictatorships established by Joseph Stalin in the Soviet Union and Adolf Hitler in Germany in the 20th century.

These ideologically driven regimes murdered 14 million civilians, mainly Jews, Ukrainians, Belarusians, Poles, Russians and Balts, in a blood-soaked area extending from Poland and the Baltic states to Ukraine and Russia.

Timothy Snyder, a Yale University professor of history, presents a sweeping chronology and stinging indictment of this man-made demographic catastrophic in an important book, Bloodlands: Europe Between Hitler and Stalin (Basic Books). He's not, of course, the first scholar to deal with this immense and highly troubling topic. But he may be the first to synthesize these events in an impressively coherent narrative under the cover of a single volume.

The killings he examines in such meticulous fashion began with Stalin's scheme to collectivize the lands of Ukrainian farmers, which resulted in the deaths of three million lives, and continued with the Great Terror, during which time about 700,000 dissidents were shot and killed.

More deaths followed as German and Soviet armies occupied Poland in 1939 and as Germany invaded the Soviet Union some two years later.

In occupied Poland and the Soviet Union, the Nazis killed millions of Jewish men, women and children. He cites a death toll of 5.4 million Jews, though the commonly acceptable figure is six million.

Snyder starts with the Soviets' 1928 Five-Year Plan under which farms would be seized, peasants would be forced to work in shifts and crops would be treated as state property. To Stalin, collectivization would allow the state to control agricultural output, feed its workers and earn hard currency for investment in industry.

Stalin's Jewish associate, Lazar Kaganovich, was placed in charge of the project. When peasants resisted and staged a grain strike, he reacted ruthlessly, imposing mass starvation on them. Stalin, in 1933, announced that they would be "liquidated as a class."

Apart from being starved, they were resettled in remote camps, known as gulags. Rafal (Raphael) Lemkin, the Polish Jewish lawyer who coined the term genocide, would describe the oppression of Ukrainian peasants as "the classic example of Soviet genocide."

Snyder compares collectivization to the Nazi boycott of Jewish businesses in Germany, but the comparison is misleading, since Stalin's policy was not based on race or forced emigration.

He is on firmer ground when discussing Soviet and German concentration camps. By 1938, more than one million Soviet citizens had been sent to dreaded gulags. By contrast, 20,000 Germans had been dispatched to such camps as Dachau and Buchenwald. "Soviet terror, at this point, was not only on a far greater scale," Snyder writes. "It was incomparably more lethal."

He claims that the Great Terror of 1937 and 1938, when Stalin wiped out political opponents, was essentially based on ethnic grounds. The Polish national minority in the Soviet Union, along with Ukrainian farmers, were scapegoated for the failure of collectivization, he says. Ethnic Poles were deported to the wilds of Siberia and Kazakhstan. In 1940, 4,400 Polish army officers were executed in Katyn.

Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union ushered in "a calamity that defies description," Snyder notes. As war raged, the Germans killed more than 10 million people.

In Snyder's assessment, Hitler and Stalin were arch social Darwinists, with both fervently believing that progress was only possible after violent struggle between races and classes.

Hitler, he observes, treated the Slavs much as North Americans dealt with the indigenous Indians. The Nazis used food as a weapon, subjecting Soviet citizens to starvation on a grand scale.

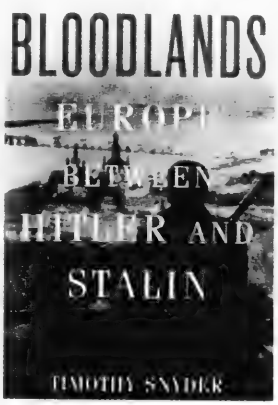
By his estimate, Germany shot and starved to death more than two million Soviet prisoners of war. Conversely, about 600,000 German PoWs and labourers died in Soviet camps.

Snyder reminds us that the Nazis associated Soviet brutality with Jews, thereby fanning antisemitism among Ukrainians in particular.

Poland was a Nazi killing ground. From 1941 to 1944, Jews were exterminated at six major facilities: Chelmno, Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka, Majdanek and Auschwitz. Still other Jews were shot en masse, with the German army aiding and abetting such operations.

Germany's ally, Romania, was complicit in the Holocaust, murdering 300,000 Jews, mainly in Transnistria, seized from the Soviet Union.

During the war, Stalin targeted Soviet minorities. Aside from ethnic Poles, he deported 89,000 Finns, 900,000 ethnic Germans and a host of Muslims in the Caucasus and Crimea, including Kalmyks, Chechens, Balkars and Tatars.



The Soviet leadership, he writes, was not particularly concerned with the plight of Jews. After 1941, Stalin never singled out Jews as Hitler's victims, and in the wake of the war, Moscow distanced itself from Jewish suffering. "In the Communist worldview, it was not the Jews but the Slavs who were the central figures, as victors and victims, in the Second World War."

For Soviet Jews, the postwar era was an utter disaster. With the emergence of state antisemitism in 1948, the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee was formally dissolved and Jews were dismissed from their positions, accused of being both "Jewish nationalists" and "rootless cosmopolitans." It hardly mattered that these glib categories cancelled each other out.

As Snyder correctly points out, Soviet-style antisemitism spread its tentacles into eastern Europe. "It was rarely a tool of governance, but it was always available in moments of political stress." Show trials in Czechoslovakia and antisemitic purges in Poland completed the picture.

Past and present mingled as assimilated Jews were hounded out of Poland after 1967. Snyder's capsule comment is telling: "Residents of Warsaw could not help but notice that they left from a railway station not far from the Umschlagplatz, whence the Jews of Warsaw had been deported by train to Teblinka only 20 years earlier."

INTERNATIONAL

U.S. can count only on Israel

When Obama and his advisers look at a map of the region, they see only one state they can count on: Israel. The regime is stable, and support for America is well-entrenched. Obama may dislike Netanyahu and his policy on the Palestinians, but after losing his allies in Turkey, Lebanon and Egypt, and with the uneasiness gripping his friends in Jordan and the Gulf, Washington can't afford to be choosy. He will have to move closer to Israel, and for another reason as well: an anxious Israel is an Israel that is prone to military adventures, and that's the last thing Obama needs right now.

Now is the time for Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak to justify their claim that Israel is the West's outpost in the Middle East. Israel should use the regional crisis to heighten security and diplomatic cooperation with Washington, and not to expand the settlements. Israel, too, can't be too choosy, after losing strategic alliances with both Turkey and Egypt within a year.

Last weekend's phone conversation between Obama and Netanyahu, after a prolonged estrangement, was the first sign of their awareness of the opportunities represented by the crisis.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who has forged close ties with Obama, was to arrive in Israel on Monday. Netanyahu could use her as a channel of communication to the White House and give her the honour of restoring relations between Jerusalem and Washington. It's Netanyahu's opportunity.

Jewish player drafted by Ducks alleges antisemitism

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A Jewish hockey player is taking his former employers in the East Coast Hockey League and the NHL to court over allegations of antisemitism.

Jason Bailey, a native of Ottawa, is alleging that the Bakersfield Condors of the ECHL, as well as its NHL affiliate, the Anaheim Ducks, and two Condors coaches were guilty of antisemitic harassment and discrimination.

A third-round selection in the 2005 NHL entry draft, Bailey was traded by the Ducks to the Ottawa Senators and now plays for the Senators' AHL farm team in Binghamton. He claims Martin Raymond, the Condors' head coach, and Mark Pederson, the team's former assistant head coach, repeatedly targeted him with antisemitic insults.

In court documents filed last week in Los Angeles, he also alleges that his playing time was limited and that he was demoted to a team in Iowa as retaliation for raising concerns about the treatment he received.

"From the beginning of Mr. Bailey's time with the Condors to its end, Mr. Bailey was subject to severe and/or pervasive harassment on the basis of religion by being forced to endure a barrage of antisemitic, offensive and degrading verbal attacks regarding his Jewish faith," the court document states.

The legal complaint goes on to outline a number of instances of antisemitic harassment. Raymond allegedly said Jews "only care about money and who's who." Raymond also referred to his own Jewish ex-wife as a "bitch" who took all his money, and he allegedly stated "he never wanted this son to be raised Jewish or to wear a yarmulke," the document states.

The allegations involving Pederson are also disconcerting. When he received a friend request for his Facebook page, Pederson allegedly told Bailey, "I got a friend request from a dirty Jew."

And when Bailey's name came up in a team meeting over who should be in charge of raising money for a team party, Pederson said, "I don't know if we can trust him with the money. He's Jewish."

The documents say Bailey found his working conditions "intolerable and hostile." He complained to Ducks assistant general manager David McNab, who told Bailey he and the Ducks found his complaints unbelievable.

Afterwards, Bailey claims, he was sent in retaliation to the Iowa Chops for two months, where he received almost no playing time. During that time, Bailey complained to Condors owner Jonathan Fleisig, who ignored his concerns.

After the Ducks tried to demote him to the Central Hockey League – Bailey cited his contract and refused the move – the team suspended Raymond for one week and Pederson for two.

The coaches each wrote letters of apology to Bailey, but the player's Los Angeles lawyer, Keith Fink, believes the letters were completely insincere.

Raymond said his "intent was to have a jovial moment" and that as a French-Canadian, "I, too, have come face to face with bigotry and understand how such remarks can negatively affect lives."

Pederson said he never intended to insult or hurt Bailey and "from all that has happened, I have learned and become a better person."

Fink said the letters acknowledged the coaches' misconduct. "Both coaches should be gone" (fired), he said, and the Condors should implement anti-discrimination training for its personnel. The teams should also put into place a proper grievance mechanism to address future complaints.

The court complaint go further. It asks for general and punitive damages, though the amount requested is currently unspecified.

Fink told The CJN that "the team did not expect Jason to take this step. This in no way will help his career within the old boy network." Because of it, pro teams will likely pass over him when there is another player with similar abilities available, Fink suggested.

Bailey is the grandson of Holocaust survivors and was brought up to not accept antisemitic treatment, Fink said.

"He comes from a family with a good set of values and character, and that means more than a paycheque at the end of the day."

Jason's dad, an Ottawa doctor, has the attitude of "never again. He's that school. You have any antisemitism and you put yourself in front of a speeding train. That's the mentality."

Fink said that since the story broke, he received six e-mails in two days from college and professional athletes saying they had experienced similar incidents and thanking Bailey for raising the issue.

Alex Voihanski agrees Jewish players face antisemitic comments at various stages of their careers. Voihanski, general manager of International Scouting Services, which scouts, evaluates, analyzes and ranks players aged 16 to 19, said "what Bailey's reporting is pretty extreme, like something you'd have expected 30 or 40 years ago."

But he's heard from Jewish players at the college and junior levels that they too have faced antisemitism. "The guys don't report it because they don't want to be blackballed. I'm sure it's sometimes done in jest, but it's a game that historically has not been full of minorities.

"I don't think it's rampant, but it's there. I've heard it from numerous guys, everything from 'dirty Jew' to comments about Jews and money."

Voihanski described Bailey as a very good skater who plays a grinding game and is adept at cycling the puck down low. He was slated to be part of the Canadian team at the 2007 World Jewish Championships in Israel, but had to pull out when the Ducks changed the start of their rookie camp.

The Ducks and Condors have not responded to media requests for comments. Ironically, the Ducks are owned by Henry and Susan Samueli, philanthropists known for giving to a number of Jewish causes.

ESPN.com reported last week that the NHL is investigating Bailey's allegations.

Comedian writes about Oprah – no, not that Oprah!

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

With about 20 years experience as a standup comic, Michael Gelbart feels comfortable and confident about his ability to connect with an audience and make them laugh.

But connecting with readers through a novel is new to Gelbart.

A Montreal native who moved to Toronto with his family in his early teens, Gelbart has built an impressive career since he started doing standup at the Yuk Yuk's comedy club when he was still in high school.

Since then, he has starred in two comedy specials that aired on CBC and CTV, written for film and television, and landed a couple small acting gigs.

Most recently, 37-year-old Gelbart, who spends most of his time in Los Angeles, wrote a self-published debut novel titled The Other Oprahs, about four women who share a name with one of the most famous, powerful women in the world, Oprah Winfrey.

He said he was inspired to write this book when he performed a show with Greg Behrendt, who wrote He's Just Not That Into You.

They talked about his rise to fame after he had written the book, and Behrendt told him that his book – which has since been made into a film – didn't really become a huge sensation until Winfrey featured it on her talk show.

"That was a light-bulb moment, where I was like, 'Wow, Oprah has so much power. It would really suck if your name was Oprah because no matter how good you are... even if you had a huge accomplishment in your life, people would [hear the name] and always think of her,'" Gelbart said.

He decided to write a work of fiction that combined this idea with the knowledge he gained from relationships with ex-girlfriends.

"I decided to write a work of fiction and put some of my thoughts or ideas or observations about women and give them to the characters."

Oprah Goldstein, the first of four Oprahs – who Gelbart said was named as a "shout out to his fellow Jews"– works in advertising and desperately wants to overcome her fear of singing in public.

Professionally, life is good for Oprah Winston who is a tough, determined, successful real estate agent who hosts a local TV show. But her teenage son wants nothing to do with her, despite her efforts to reconnect with him.

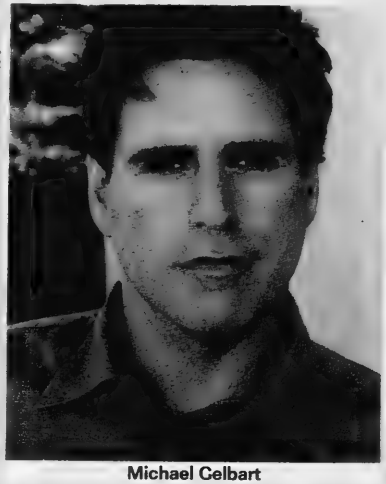
Oprah Star is an aspiring model/actress who stumbled on her raw talent as a boxer. She considers embracing her talent – but only if it'll help her lose four pounds.

Finally, Oprah Fanning, a celebrity memorabilia collector, is the reason the four Oprahs find each other. She started a chat room for anyone who shares her first name. On this forum, the women support each other through their successes and failures, while building relationships.

Gelbart said he was apprehensive about creating four female characters and contemplated giving the idea to one of his female writer friends, but eventually chose to tackle the challenge himself.

"If you're going to write four completely different women and you're not a woman and it seems cumbersome, the best thing to do is not see them as women, but as human beings," he said.

"I had to get over the fact that they were women. I took observations I made throughout my relationships, I took little things from different women I dated."



Michael Gelbart

'It would really suck if your name was Oprah... because people would [hear the name] and always think of her.'

In fact, while Gelbart attributes his ability to create female characters to a number of failed relationships, he joked that it's also the reason he isn't more famous.

"I've been in some serious relationships through the years and spent more time dating than I did focusing on my career at some points. So times when I should have been working hard, I was on the phone with some girl going, 'No, I didn't say that, you said that!'

"But I don't want to view any of that time as wasted, because I learned a lot, and when I came up with the idea for the book, that was when I realized that I could take all that knowledge I obtained in those relationships and turn it into something positive."

Now that his latest project is complete, Gelbart is ready to present it to the world in a format that he thinks he invented.

During a book signing he's doing at the Indigo bookstore in the Manulife Centre in Toronto on Feb. 17, Gelbart said he plans to have female comedians and actresses play the characters.

"These are four women speaking in the first person, so it would be really weird if I was reading as them. I know a lot of actresses and comedians in Toronto, and they were eager to do it."

He added that if he is doing a book signing in a city that doesn't have local talent, he'll organize an online contest that asks people to submit videos of the four characters speaking and viewers can vote on the best ones.

While he's north of the border promoting his novel, Gelbart will also be using the opportunity to so some stand-up.

From Feb. 10 to 12, he'll be in Halifax, headlining at the local Yuk Yuk's, and from Feb. 16 to 20, Gelbart will be performing at the Toronto Yuk Yuk's.

Bummed Out Bubbie

Dear Ella,

I'm a 75-year-old widow who has raised three children. I am blessed with eight wonderful grandchildren whom I love dearly and equally.

But what kind of bubbie dreads having her grandchildren visit for a week in her Florida condo? When my son, Adam, his wife, Susan, and their two boys, Lucas, 4, and Dylan, 7, come to visit, it's like a tornado ripping through, destroying everything in its path.

Adam and Susan believe discipline means a "time-out." When one of the boys misbehaves, which means they have already done irreparable damage, he's forced to sit at a table for a few minutes, but with access to an electronic gaming device. This is a consequence? There was an incident in which I grabbed Dylan's arm as he was jumping on my living room couch and I smacked his bottom. The way Susan berated me, you would have thought I committed the worst crime. I love those two boys, but not in my home. They're planning to visit during their spring break. How do I get out of it without being a shrew? I'm feeling very guilty.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

Bummed Out Bubbie

Dear Bummed Out Bubbie,

Adam and Susan have put you in an unfortunate position. There's no proven method of disciplining a child. Many of us grew up being spanked from time to time and have not turned out too badly. However, many experts feel physical discipline is a form of violence acted out when a parent has lost control.

Discipline without physical punishment can be very effective if it's done properly, but many parents have not mastered this method. A time-out during which a child is playing a game or watching TV isn't much of a deterrent from committing the same unacceptable behaviour in the future.

Adam and Susan have made a decision on how to raise their children, and you must respect their choice. If you feel their method is ineffective and your solace and personal property are being damaged because of it, you have every right to protect yourself.

At 75, you've done your time and it's your turn for enjoyment and relaxation. You need to communicate your feelings. Don't lecture them on whether their method is working. It's not your place. However, as you respect their choices, they must respect yours. You have earned the right to a peaceful, safe home without the whirlwind of two unruly children. Tell them how much you love them and how you would enjoy spending time together, just not under your roof. Suggest that they rent something nearby, and maybe offer to help them find something. Let them know that at this stage in your life, you don't have the patience to live with two rambunctious, albeit adorable, boys.

Adam and Susan need to take responsibility and accept the repercussions when their disciplinary methods don't work. If they're smart, they'll realize that time with Bubbie is more important than where they stay during their visit.

Some insight into steroids

We were discussing a patient during palliative care rounds. The attending physician said, "It's amazing how well she has done with the Decadron. When she came in from home, she was almost comatose, and the family believed she would soon be gone. Within days, she became alert and now can interact with them. They think it's a miracle."

She continued, "I explained the effects of Decadron [one of the trade names for a potent corticosteroid – the class of drugs often referred to as steroids] on brain metastases, from her primary [original source of cancer] in her lung. It may be weeks or longer that she benefits, but eventually that will come to an end. Meanwhile, I told them to enjoy whatever days or weeks they have left together."

Senior Side of Life

By Michael Gordon

I had heard similar stories before, ranging from minimal to sometimes very dramatic effects of steroids, as in the current case. As we spoke, I recounted an interesting interaction I had some weeks earlier while giving a talk on elder-care ethics at an out-of-town conference. The audience comprised health care professionals and lay people, some of whom were family members of patients in the care of the nursing home that was hosting the event. During the question-an-answer period, I was addressed by a lay member of the audience. "Is it not unethical to prescribe steroids to older individuals? Are they not particularly dangerous drugs with lots of side effects?" the person asked.

I tried to answer in general terms, as I learned long ago that a large forum isn't the place to have patient-specific discussions. The last thing I would want is for someone to say to a treating physician, "Well, Dr. Gordon, the well-known geriatrician, stated quite emphatically that it's 'wrong' or 'right,' or 'proper' or 'improper,' to prescribe steroids to older people."

I tried to give a general answer, "It depends on the situation. There are times that steroids can be very useful in treating certain conditions that can occur in the elderly. You should ask the attending physician about the reasons for the decision."

The person persisted. "But why would a doctor even consider steroids, with all their side effects. We read about steroids all the time – they should be dangerous drugs. I looked it up and found many instances in which steroids have caused serious problems. I believe it's unethical to prescribe such a drug to an older person. Don't you agree?"

It was clear that I had to move on, and, as diplomatically as possible, I said, "It's always dangerous to enter into a discussion about a specific clinical situation without all the information. This isn't an appropriate place to discuss individual cases."

The person tried to continue, but I called on someone else to ask a question pertinent to the general topic under discussion. The point of the story is that steroids – meaning corticosteroids, not anabolic steroids for muscle mass enhancement – have many potential medical uses. Although they can have many potentially serious side effects, they can also have dramatically beneficial effects, depending on the underlying condition.

The important thing is to discuss the use of such medications with a physician and be wary of what you might find in a general Internet search. It may be very misleading if you don't find reliable and reputable resources on drugs and clinical information specific to the condition under consideration.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press). Israelis wary of Egyptian uprising

Jewish and Arab Israelis, some holding Palestinian flags, continued their protest near the Egyptian embassy in Tel Aviv calling for the resignation of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Some protesters held signs with anti-Mubarak slogans which read: "It's time for the regimes of tyrants to be replaced around the world." Israeli police ensured the security of the embassy. Please see related stories on pages 4, 8, 9, 11, 12, 31, 32, 33, 34. [Flash90 photo]

'We certainly don't know if it's good or bad'

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — As mass demonstrations raged in the streets of Cairo and pressure was building on Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to resign, pundits as well as Israelis from all walks of life weigh in on how the turmoil in Egypt could affect Israel.

Tel Aviv-based blogger Benjamin Kerstein, writing on Pajamasmedia.com, put the Israeli interest in Egypt in context in his entry, "Watching Egypt burn: an Israeli perspective."

"Like the rest of the world, Israel doesn't know what to think about the revolution in Egypt," Kerstein wrote. "We aren't even sure if it really is a revolution. We certainly don't know if it's good or bad. And we have absolutely no idea what the eventual outcome will be."

But, he continued, "Unlike the rest of the world, what is happening now in Egypt has immediate and potentially disastrous consequences for the Jewish state."

Given this reality, it's no wonder most commentators have envisioned the worst-case scenario, namely that rather than leading to the election of a democratic government, the outcome of the current unrest in Egypt will be a power vacuum that will create an opportunity for the ascent of a radical Islamic entity, as happened during the Iranian Revolution in 1979.

Abbas Milani, director of Iranian studies at Stanford University and co-director of the Iran Democracy Project at the Hoover Institution, thinks that will happen in Egypt. Milani told Mideast blogger Michael Totten in an interview, titled "The Iranian Revolution echoes in Egypt," that the Muslim Brotherhood, the only large, organized opposition group in Egypt, is likely to fill any vacuum left by Mubarak.

The potential consequences for Israel of a hostile Islamist government in Egypt are obvious and go beyond the dissolution of Egypt's peace treaty with Israel. As one Israeli woman, 37-year-old Rotem Cohen, sipping coffee in a Tel Aviv café put it, "The worst case scenario for Israel? Instead of having Lebanon on one side, we'll have Lebanon on three sides, or even four, between Egypt, Gaza, and now maybe Jordan, too.

"That's the scariest thing about what's happening right now," said Cohen, a mother of two. "It seems to be spreading to other places in the Arab world, and look at the pattern – wherever there's weakness, Iran jumps in and takes over. That's what happened in Gaza and in Lebanon."

CHW Target Set

MONTREAL — Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) has launched its 2011 campaign with the goal of raising $2.5 million for programs benefiting women and children and health care in Israel and Canada. Among the projects the organization supports in Israel are the Hadassim Children and Youth Village, the Nahal Youth Village, Netanya Technological High School, the Neri Bloomfield College of Design, and six daycare centres. Founded in 1917, CHW, whose national headquarters is in Montreal, has 10,000 members in more than 40 communities in Canada.

Spiegel Joins Shul

TORONTO — Beth Tzedec Congregation – Canada's largest shul, with 2,700 member families – has appointed Randy Spiegel as its executive director. Spiegel, executive director of the Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto for the past 8-1/2 years, starts his new position next month.

Muslims Visit Camp

WARSAW — Some 150 Mideast Muslim leaders, as well as Jewish clergy and Christians, visited Auschwitz together. The Muslims, from Morocco, Jordan, Turkey and Iraq, were joined by politicians from around the world at the site of the former death camp Feb. 1 to mark its liberation in 1945. They were led by the mayor of Paris and members of the Aladdin Project, a Paris-based program that teaches Shoah history to Muslims through programs such as translating texts into Arabic and Persian.

18+ Rating For Film

BERLIN — German authorities have barred people under 18 from seeing a Turkish film widely considered antisemitic. Jewish groups are raising concerns about the release in Europe of Valley of the Wolves-Palestine, which critics say demonizes Israelis and contains virulent stereotypes of Jews as bloodthirsty child-killers. Deidre Berger, head of the American Jewish Committee office in Berlin, welcomed the decision by Germany's ratings agency to restrict access to the film, which depicts a group of Turks who set out to avenge the killing of nine Turks by Israeli soldiers on the Mavi Marmara boat, which tried to break the naval blockade of Gaza last May.

Incidents Still High

LONDON — Antisemitic incidents in Britain fell significantly in 2010 from their record high, but the number was the second-most in a year since records have been kept, an annual report said. Figures released Feb. 3 by the Community Security Trust saw 639 antisemitic incidents reported in 2010. A record 926 occurred in 2009, largely attributed to Israel's war in Gaza. Included in the 2010 reported incidents were 114 assaults, 83 incidents of damage and desecration of property, 385 incidents of verbal abuse, graffiti and hate mail, 32 direct threats, and 25 cases of mass-mailed leaflets and e-mails.

Accused Nazi Dies Before Trial

Peter Egner

SEATTLE — A retiree living near Seattle, Wash., accused of committing genocide and other crimes as a Nazi officer during World War II died a month before his denaturalization trial.

Peter Egner, 88, died Jan. 26 in an assisted-living community in Bellevue, the Seattle Times reported.

Egner, a Yugoslavia native, was accused of joining the Nazi-controlled Security Police and Security Service in April 1941 in German-occupied Belgrade. The Nazi mobile killing unit took part in killing some 17,000 Serbians in World War II.

Egner came to the United States in 1960 and became a citizen six years later. The Justice Department filed a lawsuit in 2008 to strip him of his citizenship, saying he lied about his Nazi past on his citizenship application.

Egner admitted volunteering for the Security Police and Security Service, and to guarding prisoners as they were being transferred to concentration camps. He also admitted being an interpreter during interrogations of political prisoners that sometimes involved torture. Prisoners often were executed afterward. Serbia had formally requested his extradition to stand trial in Serbia.

UJA, CJC sever ties with Winchevsky Centre

Jewish group disassociated over anti-Israel speakers

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) have disassociated themselves from the Winchevsky Centre over an event held at the secular Jewish institution that featured an anti-Zionist speaker.

But the two organizations left the door open to discuss the issue, and Maxine Hermolin, executive director of the centre, has requested a meeting.

The Feb. 1 event, titled "Never Again for Anyone," featured Auschwitz survivor Hajo Meyer, a member of the International Jewish Anti-Zionist Network (IJAN), which co-sponsored the evening with American Muslims for Palestine and the Middle East Children's Alliance.

Meyer – whose appearance was his only Canadian stop on a North American speaking tour – was joined by Aboriginal writer Lee Maracle and Khaled Mouammar, president of the Canadian Arab Federation.

According to Howard English, the federation's vice-president of corporate communications, Meyer crossed the line when he told his audience, "it [Israel] has grown much more aggressive and much less human than in the years after the Second World War. So that means that it can very easily lead to the destruction of Israel as a state from within. That is one of my hopes."

English did not attend the event, but said that UJA Federation and CJC sent someone to monitor it, and that the quote was taken from a recording of Meyer's speech. He said it was "particularly repugnant in our eyes and symbolized what this event was all about."

Len Rudner

In a Feb. 3 letter to Hermolin, representatives of the federation and CJC stated that the organizations had no alternative but to sever their affiliation because of the belief that "providing a platform for these views serves to strengthen those who work toward Israel's destruction."

The letter was signed by Sheldon Goodman and David Spiro, co-chairs of the federation's committee on public affairs, and by Frank Bialystok, chair of CJC, Ontario region.

In a joint phone interview last Friday, English and Len Rudner, Ontario regional director of Canadian Jewish Congress, said they could not recall either organization taking such a step in recent decades.

However, roughly 60 or 70 years ago (depending who you ask), CJC expelled United Jewish People's Order (UJPO) – an institution of the Winchevsky Centre and a co-sponsor of last week's event – over concerns about UJPO's support of communism and allegations of Soviet control of the organization. UJPO became part of CJC again until about half a dozen years ago, when CJC passed a bylaw allowing only for individual membership, not group membership, David Abramowitz, president of UJPO Canada, told The CJN.

Paradigm shifting

From the editor's desk...

Like tectonic plates, when a paradigm shifts, we often lose our balance. We seek to hold on to the familiar markers, but they are not where they once were. The plates settle. The paradigm settles. And then so do we.

But it can take a long time.

The paradigm is massively shifting in the Middle East. But it has not yet settled. First Tunisia. Now Egypt where the situation is quite fluid. Events were still unfolding there as these words were written late last week some 13 days after the protests began. Which Arab country will next force the removal of its autocratic rulers?

Out with the old order, the protesting masses have said. But who and what are coming in with the new order? Pundits, analysts, commentators, observers and editors have run amok in every journalistic and blogging medium the past month offering their invaluable expertise on precisely every aspect of the situation in Egypt and the Middle East.

No one clairvoyantly predicted the sudden, even shocking, fall of the Mubarak regime. No one, yet, can predict the regime that will replace it.

From the vantage of someone who lives in an open, free, liberal western democratic society and who deeply cares about the future of the Jewish state, the following are two key recurring thoughts.

1. We hope for the flowering of a successful, democratic society in Egypt in which its people will be free to pursue their personal and societal prosperity and who will consider themselves aligned with the democratic West as well as culturally and historically with other nations of the Middle East.

2. We fear for the future.

Not surprisingly, writers in Israel, who are increasingly concerned over the possibility of enemies soon on all sides of the country's borders, have been especially poignant in expressing the incongruity of these two competing yet complementary thoughts.

Ha'aretz columnist Anshel Pfeffer, was in Cairo last week in Tahrir Square during the first days of the rioting. For fear of being harmed, he did not disclose that he was Jewish or Israeli. Pfeffer acknowledged President Hosni Mubarak's steadfast protecting of the bilateral Egyptian-Israeli relationship. But also pointed out that the strong relationship at the diplomatic level did not translate to positive feelings for Israel with the rioting "man on the street."

"But Israel still remains a convenient bogeyman for all occasions. Those in Israel who have been bewailing the almost certain loss of a staunch strategic ally would do well to remember that in his three decades as president, Mubarak did very little, if anything, to educate his people and change their devilish perspective of Israel.

"I would like to believe that contrary to the prophecies of doom emanating from the corridors of power in Jerusalem this week, the revolution in Egypt will not ultimately result in an Islamic republic on the Negev border. Certainly hundreds of Egyptians I spoke to over the last seven days have no intention of allowing that to happen. Mubarak kept the peace for 30 years, and there is certainly reason to be grateful for that. But it is still considered dangerous to walk the streets of Cairo speaking Hebrew, even when all is calm."

Writing last week in the Globe and Mail, renowned Jerusalem-based commentator Yossi Klein Halevi expressed profound disappointment in the way that U.S. President Barack Obama seemed to have instantly disengaged from his former ally Mubarak. "Obama's demand that Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak accept an immediate transition of power has hardly calmed an anxious Israeli people watching the fall of its closest Arab ally. For Israelis, the American president doesn't appear principled and resolute but untrustworthy and flailing. By insisting that Mr. Mubarak immediately resign, Mr. Obama undermines the possibility of a peaceful transition that could empower democrats, rather than the Islamist Muslim Brotherhood," Halevi wrote.

It appears that Obama was persuaded by the line of thought expressed by Halevi. The American administration entirely changed its approach last weekend regarding Mubarak. As reported in Ha'aretz, Obama's special envoy for Egypt, Frank Wisner, said on Saturday that Mubarak must stay in power for the time being to steer changes needed for political transition. (The Obama administration subsequently said Wisner didn't coordinate his comments with the U.S. government, but did not contradict the nub of his statement.)

Halevi also astutely noted that "Israelis will not consider a withdrawal from the West Bank at a time when Israel's treaty with Egypt – so far, the only successful land-for-peace agreement – appears at risk."

The political ground in the Middle East is shifting. We grasp for new markers of stability, with both hope and fear guiding our hands.

Hillel launches Schalit awareness campaign

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A student-led campaign is underway at the University of Toronto to raise awareness about Gilad Schalit – an Israeli soldier who was kidnapped by Hamas in 2006 – and to motivate the Red Cross to continue its efforts to secure a meeting with him.

"He hasn't been visited by the Red Cross. Under the Geneva Convention, the International Committee of the Red Cross [ICRC] has the right to visit prisoners of war. They haven't been given that right because they're dealing with a terrorist organization," said Beca Bookman, Hillel of Greater Toronto's Israel affairs chair.

Schalit, who was kidnapped by Hamas in a cross-border raid two months before his 20th birthday, has not once been visited by the Red Cross despite repeated requests. International humanitarian law dictates that Schalit is entitled to visits by the ICRC to determine his health and living conditions. He is also entitled to some form of contact with family, but to date, the only contact between Schalit and the outside world has been through three letters, an audio tape and a video.

"He's been in captivity for the last four years, so students in university can relate to that. If they just graduated high school, they know what [four years] means, if they're just graduating from university, they definitely know what four years means," said Bookman, 20, a political science and Jewish studies student.

Students explain the importance of the Schalit awareness campaign at U of T.

The campaign started Jan. 26 and runs twice a week until Feb. 21 in various high-traffic areas on campus. It borrows its theme, "How do you measure four years?" from Seasons of Love, a song featured in the musical Rent.

Bookman said that instead of handing out flyers with information they suspect most students won't read, they opted to put up large posters that will catch their attention.

The first poster asks students to think about what they managed to do over the span of four years, and to write their accomplishments down on sticky notes that are then added to the poster.

The second display has a picture of Schalit and lists the main details of who he is and his current situation.

"The banners are very engaging, they are exciting looking... It has a face of a human being – students don't know who he is, so they're stopping and wondering what's going on," Bookman said.

"Once they are educated, we have postcards that we printed up that we'll be sending to the International Committee of the Red Cross to remind them that he is still in this horrible situation and that they should continue their work in trying to get visitation rights."

She said the message on postcards offers support to the ICRC and its aim of providing basic human rights to people.

"But after four years, we want them to know we still care about Gilad Schalit and hope they will continue their efforts in working toward gaining their visitation rights... We understand that four years is too long for any person to have gone without a visit from family, friends and people who care."

Bookman said the campaign has been well-received, and in just three days of tabling, more than 100 postcards were signed.

"Students appreciate what the Red Cross does and they support its work, so they're happy to get involved with this campaign."

The event has also opened the door to debate and dialogue about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Bookman said.

"We're happy to discuss those issues... But this campaign is about a human life... so we're talking with people who may have questions, or they have ideas and we talk about them."

No self-delusion

U.S. President Barack Obama last week changed his tack while trying to sail his foreign policy in the raging seas of Egyptian unrest. As he witnessed the depth and permanence of the protests against the Mubarak regime, his first response was to call for the immediate stepping down of the Egyptian president from power. On the weekend however, he significantly altered position by suggesting Mubarak should be part of the orderly transition to fair and open elections in Egypt. We can only speculate what caused the change in the president's thinking. We can however say that it was unworthy of the American administration to have treated its former staunch ally like a piece of smelly detritus to be quickly tossed away to placate the surging throngs in Cairo.

Recently appointed vice-president Omar Suleiman has been leading the negotiations with various opposition parties to try to establish a protocol of transition to the post-Mubarak days.

It is hard to gauge how smoothly those talks are progressing. Self-appointed opposition leader Mohamed ElBaradei complained that the Suleiman-led negotiations were "opaque." "Nobody knows who is talking to who at this stage," he told the media on Sunday. And yet, as reported in Ha'aretz, a representative of ElBaradei's group, National Association for Change, met with Suleiman on Sunday and described the talks as "a positive first step."

The Muslim Brotherhood, too, has been invited by Suleiman to join the talks. Two weeks ago, the Brotherhood was a banned political party. Today, it appears to be part of Egypt's political future. This is extremely worrisome.

Like its hard-core, radical Islamist ideological kinfolk in the region, the Brotherhood is shrewdly using the levers of democracy in the hope of imposing its anti-democratic orthodoxy upon the people and society that it would govern.

Jerusalem Post editor David Horowitz last week reminded us what the group stands for. "The Brotherhood is committed to death-cult jihad in the cause of widened Islamist rule, [and] was the progenitor of Hamas and central to Islamist radicalization among the Palestinians."

Brotherhood spokesperson Essam el-Erian told the New York Times last week that "Israel must know that it is not welcome by the people in this region." Another Brotherhood spokesperson, Mohamed Morsy, last week refused to say his party would honour the Israel-Egypt peace treaty. He refused to say he would recognize Israel. He did not, however, refuse to remind the world that the Brotherhood opposes Zionism – that is, a Jewish sovereign state in the Middle East.

Only the Egyptians will ultimately determine who and how they will be governed after Hosni Mubarak. But we must not delude ourselves about the nature of the Egyptian Brotherhood and the nature of a future Egypt they might govern.

Community needs to be united

Finally, the Montreal Jewish community is taking a step forward to being on the same page. Every time antisemitism rears its ugly head, we must denounce it. Quebec Jewish Congress and Federation CJA came to the conclusion that the recent cowardly acts against five synagogues and a Jewish school were, in fact, antisemitic criminal acts ("Attacks on Montreal synagogues went unreported in January 2010," Jan. 27).

I find it disturbing that our community has not been united. Why did B'nai Brith conclude that we were being targeted and not Congress? When all were aware that there were a number of antisemitic incidents in the community, why were they referred to as isolated incidents of vandalism? Do we need proof that the Young Israel of Chomedey's near disaster was an antisemitic act? The school next door was not touched, but my shul was!

Some are still concerned about bringing attention to our plight or creating copycats. Isolated acts of vandalism, indeed! And, to have seriously criticized B'nai Brith as being "extremist," as "exaggerating." For what purpose? Our silence, our perceived division, emboldens the other guys. The best way to defeat the perpetrators of hate is to expose them. We must speak up – in our schools, our holy institutions and on our streets – and let our political leaders know that we are against antisemitism and racism, but are for and united with Israel, and indeed for our Jewish brothers and sisters everywhere. We speak up for the downtrodden of all nations, because we want a better tomorrow for our children and our grandchildren.

'Let them go' should include Pollard

The box in the centre of your letters to the editor page lists Israelis missing and captured by Arab government and terrorist groups. Considering the unprecedented confinement of Jonathan Pollard, a former civilian intelligence analyst who was convicted in the United States of spying for Israel and received a life sentence in 1987 after a trial that was flawed with government intervention with a trial judge and with a breach of a plea bargain, I would suggest that Pollard be placed in the box under "Let them go!"

Bert Raphael
Thornhill, Ont.

Editor's Note: There can be no doubt that the penalty meted out to Jonathan Pollard has long ago surpassed all reasonable limits and purposes. Nevertheless, we cannot include him among the missing-in-action Israeli soldiers. It simply is not the same. To do so would totally alter the meaning of a soldier who is missing in action, whose fate and whereabouts are unknown. As much as we grieve for the plight of Pollard, the same cannot be said for and about him.

PhD student seeks Jewish immigrants

I am seeking to interview Jewish immigrants (or their children) who arrived in Canada in the late 1940s. I'm a PhD student at the University of Toronto. My research is on the history of Canadian citizenship. In particular, I focus on groups that were historically excluded from becoming Canadian, such as Jews were for most of the 1930s and 1940s. If you were a Jewish immigrant in the late 1940s, or are the child of one, and would be willing to be interviewed for about an hour, please contact me. Interviews are confidential and anonymous.

Will Israel face hostile regime in Egypt?

Leslie Susser
JTA

Egyptians demonstrate in the streets of Cairo last week. [Israel Sun photo]

For Israel, the popular uprising against the Mubarak regime raises the specter of its worst strategic nightmare: collapse of the peace treaty with Egypt, the cornerstone of its regional policy for the past three decades.

That's not the inevitable outcome of the unrest. A modified version of the Mubarak government could survive and retain the "cold peace" with Israel. But if, in a worst-case scenario, democratic or Islamic forces were to come to power denouncing Israel and repudiating the peace deal, that could herald the resurrection of a major military threat on Israel's southern border.

The largely American-equipped and American-trained Egyptian army – by far the most powerful military in the Arab world – numbers around 650,000 men, with 60 combat brigades, 3,500 tanks and 600 fighter planes. For Israel, the main strategic significance of the peace with Egypt is that it has been able to take the threat of full-scale war against its strongest foe out of the military equation. But a hostile regime in Cairo could compel Israel to rethink its military strategy, restructure its combat forces, and, in general, build a bigger army, diverting billions of shekels to that end, with major social and economic consequences.

A hostile government in Cairo could also mean that Egypt would be aiding and abetting the radical Hamas regime in neighbouring Gaza, rather than, as at present, helping to contain it.

Worse, if there is a domino effect that also leads to an anti-Israel regime change in Jordan, with its relatively large Islamic political presence, Israel could find itself facing an augmented military threat on its eastern border, too. That could leave it even worse off than it was before 1977, facing a combined military challenge from Egypt, Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and the Palestinians – with the added menace of a fundamentalist Iran that seeks to acquire nuclear weapons.

The strategic importance of the peace with Egypt has come to the fore during a number of crises over the past decade. Without it, the Second Palestinian Intifadah (2000-2005), the Second Lebanon War (2006) and the Gaza War (2008-2009) could easily have triggered wider regional hostilities. But in each case, in the teeth of region-wide popular sentiment against Israel, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak adamantly rejected calls to commit Egyptian soldiers to the fray. On the contrary, Mubarak was critical of Hezbollah in Lebanon and of Hamas in Gaza for provoking senseless killing, and he played a significant role in achieving postwar ceasefire arrangements. "Not everything Mubarak did was right," Israeli President Shimon Peres declared last week. "But he did one thing for which we all owe him a debt of gratitude. He kept the peace in the Middle East."

Because Mubarak has served as a bulwark against regional chaos and was for decades a central pillar of American strategy against the radical forces led by Iran, Israelis found it baffling that U.S. President Barack Obama turned his back on the embattled Egyptian leader so quickly. Pundits argued that Obama's stance sent a deeply disconcerting message to America's moderate allies across the region, from Saudi Arabia to Morocco, that they, too, might be as peremptorily abandoned in time of need. That message, the pundits said, might drive those equally autocratic leaders elsewhere for support, even possibly toward America's regional foe, Iran.

Secondly, the pundits insisted that by distancing himself from Mubarak, Obama was encouraging the would-be revolutionary opposition in Egypt in a gamble that could prove counterproductive to American and western interests. Clearly, Obama was hoping for democracy in Egypt and a concomitant increase in popular support for America across the region.

In his Cairo speech in June 2009, Obama offered the Muslim peoples of the Middle East a new beginning. Now, he seems to be using the Egyptian crisis to underscore that appeal to the Muslim masses. But Israeli pundits warn that this is most unlikely to work. They maintain that instead of democracy in Egypt, there could well be a two-stage revolutionary process – an initial quasi-democracy, overtaken within months by the emergence of an autocratic Islamic republic under the heel of the Muslim Brotherhood. It would be similar to what happened when the United States supported pro-democracy forces against the Shah in Iran in the 1970s, only to see the emergence of the fundamentalist ayatollahs. Moreover, in the event of an eventual Muslim Brotherhood victory, the big regional winner would be fundamentalist Iran.

Israeli diplomats across the globe have been instructed to quietly make the case for the importance of stability in Egypt. Careful not to exacerbate an already delicate situation by saying anything that might be construed as support for one side or the other, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has merely reaffirmed Israel's desire to preserve regional stability. But it's safe to assume that his government would be relieved to see power remaining in the hands of Egypt's current ruling elite — say, through a peaceful handover to Mubarak's recently appointed vice-president, Omar Suleiman.

> Mubarak has served as a bulwark against regional chaos

The Israeli hope is that Suleiman, the former head of Egypt's intelligence services and a major player in everything related to Egyptian-Israeli ties, would be able to continue Egypt's pro-western alignment and its support for the peace deal with Israel, while allowing a greater degree of democracy in Egypt and pre-empting the rise of an Islamic republic. But it's unclear how much popular support he can muster, given his close ties down the years with Mubarak, who seemingly overnight has become the most hated man in Egypt.

However the events in Egypt play out, they will clearly have an impact on the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. The very notion of a threat to the peace with Egypt will almost certainly further reduce the Netanyahu government's readiness to take risks for peace. In a news conference with German Chancellor Angela Merkel in Jerusalem last week, Netanyahu re-emphasized the importance he attaches to the security element in any peace package – "in case the peace unravels." As for the Palestinians, the Egyptian protests could trigger Palestinian demonstrations pressing for statehood – without peace or mutual concessions.

As usual, events seem to be reinforcing both sides of the Israeli political divide in their core beliefs. The right is already saying that Israel should not make peace unless it can be assured of iron-clad security arrangements, and the left maintains that if only Israel had already made peace with the Palestinians and the Arab world, then popular unrest such as the protests in Egypt would not be potentially so earth-shattering.

Either way, the events in Egypt are not good news for those advocating Israeli-Arab peacemaking. They could push efforts to resolve the conflict back several decades.

We shouldn't be smug when looking south

The year 2011 began with an assassination attempt that shocked some Americans and killed six bystanders instead of the intended victim. The attempt on U.S. Congresswoman Gabrielle Giffords should come as no surprise. Public discourse in America is poisonous. Judaism teaches that when we give words to thoughts that are destructive of another, we are destroying that person's life as surely as if we pulled a gun.

Words that cut down another person, like feathers in the wind, can never be collected and put away. Such words are heard increasingly in U.S., and now to some extent in Canadian, public discourse.

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

There is something decidedly un-Christian in the worldviews of American radical right politicians, who focus on the remarkably prescient words of Jesus "I come not to bring peace, but the sword" but forget the rest of his testaments. Proclaiming themselves Christian warriors, they destroy.

But before we preen ourselves in the mirror of self-righteousness, let's take a look at some of the public discourse in Israel. As they say, "in other news," we hear that a small but vocal group in Israel has once again voiced a disturbing message of bold and blatant discrimination veiled in religious garb.

But the problem isn't confined to this recent episode.

There are two solitudes in Israel today: not between Jew and Arab, but between Jew and Jew. This divide has been nurtured and enabled from the early days of the state. Separate school systems assure that Jewish children of each group will grow up with no idea of how the other thinks. There are no shared schools, no shared youth movements, no shared army experience, no shared responsibilities as citizens. Indeed, haredim often deride the very state that supports them. Warning of terror and catastrophe, they silence any voice of moderation.

There is no place in a western democracy, which Israel considers itself to be, for such a chasm.

For years, haredim and their supporters have deformed discourse in Israel. Recent events – the call to forbid rental or sale of land to non-Jews, warnings against dating Arab men – are simply a continuation of that trend. To continue to allow a few to speak for the many has brought Israel to this pass, paralyzing the political process and preventing meaningful change.

That thousands of men are excused from military service and allowed to collect money from the state while reviling its essence is nothing less than a scandal. If the haredim are allowed to sway national policies – both internal and external – we shouldn't be surprised if the government remains frozen. Of course, other nations assume that Israel will never want peace.

The statement from Rabbi Ovadia Yosef attributing loss of life in Israel's recent forest fire to failures of observance – as if God sent up in smoke those who did not observe Shabbat – is only one of many egregious statements from that quarter. And insisting that the state enforce law against women davening at the Kotel? What century are they living in?

These people aren't defending Jewish ethics, Jewish faith or Israel. They twist single statements in a multivalent text to fit a circumstance that they invent, then rail against.

I'm not saying that this way of thinking is similar to Nazism. State Nazism sprang from a tradition of European antisemitism dating back to the foundations of European Christianity. The state marshalled scientific and technical skills to kill millions.

Fortunately, these recent declarations have not been transformed into state policy by Israel's government (although there have been times when there have been attempts to do just that). Indeed, by their actions, the rabbis demonstrate their ignorance of the wellsprings of a tradition they profess to protect. They cannot recognize that Israel is a state of all its citizens, and however well or badly it operationalizes the principle, fortunately, it is still the principle that all citizens, Arab and Jew, men and women, are entitled to equality before the law. (Now if only the guardians of the Kotel knew this.)

Gabrielle Giffords

On the other hand, joy still abides. Public discourse in Israel has some positive developments.

Some Orthodox men have begun an experiment in dance, in a group called Ka'et ("timely"). Combining prayer movement with dance, and using tallitot as part of the movements, they connect with both the secular and religious – no small feat in a country that's very divided.

More dancing, less dismay.

Having regrets makes us human

Recently, I heard a sports star being interviewed. When asked to look back on his life, he said he had no regrets. That statement startled me. How could it be that someone has no regrets? I understand that he was satisfied with his accomplishments. His successes were significant, and he was proud of them. But to say he had no regrets is to go way beyond pride or satisfaction.

We're human after all, finite and imperfect. We live our lives without a tidy GPS guidance system telling us to turn left or right at the next corner. Surely, this man had made some mistakes in his life – gone off-road at some point. Statements such as his make me wonder what kind of modern mores and patterns of self-appraisal are considered appropriate today. How do we conceive our humanity? Is there no room for modesty or humility?

Must one present oneself as perfect, all-knowing and wise without doubts and without faults in order to be considered successful? Are we afraid to show any weakness? Do we think that there can be no fault lines here, hence we have no regrets. Perhaps if I claim no regrets, no outsider can censure or condemn me. The natural consequence of this is that we need never say, "I'm sorry."

Have you seen the program NCIS? (I confess to watching it.) It has one frequently referred-to "rule," which is, "Don't say you're sorry. It's a sign of weakness." What kind of message is that for a popular TV show to send? Since when is that courteous expression a sign of weakness instead of a sign of compassion, empathy or appropriate remorse?

Conceivably even worse was the line from the 1970 film and novel Love Story, by Erich Segal: "Love means never having to say you're sorry."

What idiocy! How can love void a human responsibility and emotion? Why should love make you immune to decency? On the contrary, one should be more obligated or responsive to the person you love.

My 20-month-old granddaughter Maya knows that it's proper to say "Sorry." I'm sorry if I did something wrong. And I'm sorry if you're sad.

What does it mean when we say sorry? Under what circumstances do we use that phrase?

Primarily, we say it when we've made a mistake or done something wrong. By using that exact phrase, we apologize and admit culpability. We do make mistakes. We do have regrets. So how can being in love release you from owning up to wrongdoing? How can taking on the responsibility for your own actions be a sign of weakness? What is this subversive cultural attitude teaching us? Is this the fashionable refrain: show no regrets, claim perfection.

We also say sorry when we show empathy with someone who is suffering. I'm sorry if you're sad or in pain. I'm sorry if there is an earthquake and people are affected. It's a necessary part of our lives as human beings to identify with others in their time of grief and relate to their emotional state.

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

It's part of our connection to express that concern by telling people that we're sorry. It's neither a sign of weakness nor irrelevant. Rather, it's a sign of our shared humanity and sense of a common community. Additionally, there are times when we're sorry in general – for the sad state of affairs without a specific focus. I can be sad and sorry. I can also be in a sorry state.

How can denying or avoiding being sorry enhance our lives. Are we denying emotion so that we appear faultless, unmarked and unblemished. In truth, that leaves us appearing inexperienced, insensitive or numb. Is that what we want to project to the world or to teach our children? If humans don't need to say sorry, if people have no regrets, how will we create a vibrant responsive and responsible social unit? What will be the civil indicators of our social units?

Finally, what does it say about ourselves as human beings if we show no regrets and never say sorry. The pretentious attempt to appear faultless only betrays a frail humanity. We are finite and imperfect. Humility seems more appropriately human.

Protests in Arab world challenge status quo

The status quo in the Middle East was shaken to its core last week as a grassroots popular uprising in Egypt cutting across class and generational lines forced its authoritarian president, Hosni Mubarak, to promise to resign after an election in September. The unrest, stirred by social networking sites, Facebook and Twitter, and galvanized by the Al Jazeera satellite television channel, erupted in demonstrations shortly after the fall of Zine El Abidine Ben Ali's dictatorial regime in Tunisia.

With Ben Ali hounded out of office after 18 years, protests swirled in Algeria and Sudan and engulfed Yemen and Jordan. In Jordan, following an increase in food and fuel prices and calls for political reform, King Abdullah II fired the prime minister and replaced him with an official who was briefly Jordan's ambassador to Israel. In Yemen, President Ali Abdullah Saleh said he would not extend his three-decade rule when his term expired in 2013.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto .

Protesters in Cairo, Amman and Sanaa called for real reform in the face of political repression, corruption, cronyism and economic stagnation. They demanded democracy, accountability, human rights and jobs, which have always been in short supply in an area plagued by despotism and residually high unemployment and underemployment.

But the focus was on Egypt, a historically and culturally pivotal nation in the Arab world, a bastion in the struggle against Islamic fundamentalism and the first Arab country to sign a peace treaty with Israel.

The turmoil in Egypt, the worst since the so-called bread riots in January 1977, was nothing less than an epic moment in the annals of the modern Middle East. Protesters' signs emblazoned with the words "Game Over" spoke volumes. For once, the hackneyed slogan "people power" really meant something.

Now 82, Mubarak came to power in 1981 after his predecessor, Anwar Sadat, was assassinated by Muslim radicals, who resented his historic rapprochement with Israel.

Mubarak, the vice-president and the former commander of the air force, was Egypt's fourth president after Mohammed Naguib, Gamal Abdel Nasser and Sadat, all military men. A cautious and colourless leader who lacked Nasser's or Sadat's charisma, he imposed a form of stability by ruthlessly crushing dissent. He quelled disturbances in 1986 when paramilitary security forces went on a rampage, burning and looting major tourist hotels near the Pyramids. He survived a serious attempt on his life in 1995. Throughout the 1990s, he successfully fought a nation-wide rebellion launched by two extremist organizations, Islamic Jihad and Gamaa Islamiya.

Mubarak ruled by decree, imposing a state of emergency soon after succeeding Sadat.

Expressions of democracy, ranging from freedom of association to freedom of speech, were banned. The government had the authority to arrest people without charge and detain them indefinitely.

Although he agreed to hold multi-party elections in 2005, this was an empty exercise in democracy, cynically designed to defuse internal tension and fend off external pressure. Since the vote was rigged, Mubarak's National Democratic party won virtually every seat in parliament. To no one's surprise, protesters set fire to NDP headquarters after the recent demonstrations got under way. Being an autocrat, Mubarak banned the Muslim Brotherhood, permitting its candidates to run only as independents in elections. He intimidated and arrested the leaders of the Egyptian Movement for Change (Kefaya), an alliance of liberal nationalists and conservative Islamists who demanded his resignation and opposed his plan to bequeath his powers to his son, Gamal, a banker and high-ranking member of the NDP.

Hosni Mubarak at the height of his powers in the 1990s

Mubarak imprisoned two of Egypt's most prominent pro-democracy figures – Ayman Nour, a member of parliament whose politically motivated arrest made a mockery of Mubarak's commitment to the rule of law, and Saad Eddin Ibrahim, a human rights activist who was jailed for "defaming" Egypt.

Mubarak also cracked down on the April 6 Youth Movement, a Facebook organization led by Ahmed Maher to support industrial workers planning a strike to demand better wages and conditions.

Though he instituted economic reforms, they did not trickle down to the mass of impoverished Egyptians, who comprise the vast majority of Egypt's population of 82 million. The pro-business reforms not only widened the gap between rich and poor, but emboldened Mubarak's legion of critics.

On the eve of the current tumult in Egypt, where revolutionary fervour burns brightly this week, tensions continued to build.

Last year, Mubarak's hand-picked legislators extended the state of emergency by two years, disillusioning Egyptians who believed it would be ended. When activists sought assurances that Mubarak's son would not succeed him, the police beat and arrested them. Succumbing to foreign entreaties, he released from prison Abdel Kareem Nabil, a blogger, who incurred the wrath of the regime by criticizing the state of emergency and the murder of fellow blogger Khaled Said, killed in police custody.

As 2010 ended, pro-democracy organizations cried foul over what they branded as a bogus election. Buoyed by events in Tunisia but upset by its failure to win a single parliamentary seat after winning a fifth of all seats five years ago, the Muslim Brotherhood demanded an end to the state of emergency and called for fresh elections.

Mubarak blithely ignored these demands, determined to be president-for-life and perpetuate his dynasty.

He was similarly tone deaf to U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's scathing critique concerning the shortcomings of Arab leaders. In a speech in Qatar in mid-January, she said: "Those who cling to the status quo may be able to hold back the full impact of their countries' problems for a little while, but not forever."

Judging by the current ferment in Egypt, she was right. But it took Mubarak a while to appreciate the gravity of the situation. After claiming that the leaderless demonstrations would destabilize Egypt, he reshuffled his cabinet, appointing Omar Suleiman, his chief of intelligence, as vice-president.

Suleiman invited the opposition to participate in a "dialogue" on constitutional and legislative reforms. The protesters reiterated their demands – Mubarak's ouster and free elections. Buckling to a U.S. demand for an "orderly transition," Mubarak announced he would not contest September's election. Before calling on Mubarak to step down, President Barack Obama urged his pre-eminent Arab ally to introduce immediate political and economic reforms.

The Egyptian army, the final arbiter of politics in Egypt since the 1952 revolution, appears satisfied with this solution, and has urged protesters to go home. Prior to this, the army renounced the use of force against "our great people" and recognized "the legitimacy of your demands." This statement signified the death knell of a pro-western Arab leader who has outlasted his welcome.

U.S. strategy during this crisis has been clear. Washington hopes that a new president will preserve its vital interests in Egypt. In all fairness, Mubarak was useful. He preserved the 1979 peace treaty with Israel, supported Israel's talks with the Palestinians, helped enforce the siege of the Gaza Strip, kept Islamic radicals in Egypt at bay, co-operated in the global war on terrorism, backed the ouster of Iraq's Saddam Hussein and quietly supported U.S. objectives in Iraq and Afghanistan.

At the end of the day, Mubarak became a liability rather than an asset. A comment made by the then-U.S. secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, in Cairo in 2005 was instructive: "For 60 years, my country pursued stability at the expense of democracy [in the Middle East], and we achieved neither."

Should we fear Egypt's Islamic Brotherhood?

Images of mass demonstrations of Egyptian civilians in the streets of Cairo and other cities against the nearly 30-year autocratic rule of President Hosni Mubarak captured the hearts and minds of the media covering this momentous event.

For almost a week after the demonstrations began, and then grew to an extent rarely seen in the Arab world, two themes dominated much of the coverage, especially (but not only) on the commentary side.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

First, that this popular and mostly peaceful uprising expressed not just a demand for the end of Mubarak's rule, but also an intense yearning for democracy.

And second, that the Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamist movement and the most organized force in the country besides the army, was being low key and moderate, and might even play a responsible role alongside secular reformers in a new government, or at least could be held in check by them.

Some acknowledged reason for a degree of skepticism, but were nonetheless cautiously optimistic that things just might work out this time. Here, for instance, is the National Post's editorial take on Feb. 1: "Of course, these are still early days – and there is no guarantee that the Islamists really will give up Egypt's future to moderates and liberals. History is littered with revolutions – including Russia's in 1917 and Iran's in 1979 – that were hijacked by radicals. Yet we believe such a hijacking is unlikely in Egypt. Like everyone else in the world, Egyptians have seen what has become of Gaza, Sudan, Taliban Afghanistan, Pakistan's tribal regions and Iran under Islamist regimes: All these lands have degenerated into poverty, internal repression and pariah status."

Anti-Mubarak protests in Cairo last week

That assessment expresses a noble aspiration, in particular from a western perspective, that would like to see reformers succeed in casting off a dictatorship and moving Egyptian society at long last toward modernity and moderation. That indeed would be a major, and arguably a monumental, achievement.

The only problem is whether the view from here of what is transpiring in Egypt actually mirrors the hopes, forces and structures on the ground over there.

Last December, the highly respected Pew Center published the results of a survey of attitudes in Arab and Muslim countries about the role of Islam in politics. It found that when asked about the struggle between modernizers and Islamic fundamentalists, Egypt ranked at the top (along with Nigeria) in supporting the latter. Nearly 60 per cent of Egyptian Muslims said they identify with the fundamentalists.

That is hardly encouraging news for those who believe Egyptian society is about to move in the direction of liberal democracy (for which, in any event, there is no foundation). Indeed, what does such research say about the prospects for reform and genuine democracy beyond the mechanics of elections? And could secular reformers who have no sustained organizational base prevail against the Brotherhood, which is not only deeply entrenched but also enjoys broad popular support?

The program of the Brotherhood includes, domestically, the imposition of Sharia law and, in foreign policy, the shredding of the peace agreement with Israel.

One often reads that former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat was assassinated in 1981 by a member of a radical "offshoot" of the Brotherhood because he made peace with the Jewish state. But as some scholars of Egypt and Islam have pointed out, it was clear from the testimony at the assassin's trial that another key motivation for the murder was Sadat's repeated refusal to implement Sharia law.

In the years after the assassination, when the Brotherhood was officially outlawed and many of its key figures arrested, tortured or constantly harassed, the organization learned to survive and play by rules that lend it the appearance of being a "moderate" religious movement. Many Israeli analysts warn, however, that when the moment is right, the Brotherhood will almost certainly seize control and place Egypt firmly in the orb of the Islamists.

If so, the consequences could be dire for both the freedom of Egyptians and the safety of Israelis.

Open Window Bakery outlet still operating

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Rumours of the complete demise of the Open Window bakery chain may have been a bit premature.

As reported last month, the 54-year-old operation closed the doors of all its facilities around the GTA on Jan. 17, leaving more than 150 employees jobless.

However, as of last week, its Thornhill outlet, located at 300 John St. in the Thornhill Square Shopping Centre, remained open and was serving baked goods to customers.

Though the branch is listed on Open Window's website as one of the now-defunct chain's locations, a call to the Thornhill outlet by The CJN revealed that it was indeed still in operation.

A manager calling himself "Simon" answered the phone. When asked how the store was still open, he said his store was "an independent."

Further questioning about how he could continue using the bankrupt company's famous logo and name, prompted him to testily respond: "I don't know. No one's called about it."

He then abruptly ended the interview, saying he was "very busy" and hung up the phone.

It was unclear where the store was sourcing its baked goods from.

The CJN was unable to contact the former owners of the chain to ask about the John Street location's continued operation, as phones continued to go unanswered at the company's head office and e-mail queries to the company's last CEO, Gail Agasi, were not returned.

Open Window bakery was founded in 1957 by Max Feig, a Holocaust survivor, along with three partners: Louis Friedman, Emil Friedman and Leslie Kellerman.

Feig took sole possession of the business in 1984 after buying out his partners, according Carole Friedman, Emil's widow.

She said it "tore at her heart" to read the story of the bakery closing and how most of the reports about it neglected to mention the other three founding partners by name.

Feig is suffering from Alzheimer's and is unaware of the demise of his business, according to his family.

Jewish chaplain retains police post

JTA

York Regional Police won't remove a rabbi as its Jewish chaplain following complaints that he made homophobic remarks.

After a five-month probe, the force said Rabbi Mendel Kaplan remains a chaplain "in good standing."

The investigation was prompted by a complaint last August by Kulanu Toronto, a group for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and queer Jews, alleging that Rabbi Kaplan, spiritual leader of Chabad @ Flamingo in Thornhill, wrote a "homophobic" e-mail to Toronto rabbis.

The controversy arose in the wake of last summer's Gay Pride Parade in Toronto in which Canadian Jewish Congress urged community-wide support for gay Jews to counter an anti-Israel group, Queers Against Israeli Apartheid.

Kulanu also cited a "vile" sermon allegedly offered by Rabbi Kaplan "in which he attacked the LGBTQ community in a more than hateful and disgusting manner." The group asked for a review of his status as a police chaplain.

In a Jan. 11 response to Kulanu, York Regional Police said that after speaking with "experts," it has determined that Rabbi Kaplan's statements were a "technically correct interpretation of scripture through his role as a rabbi" and "were not viewed as hateful."

Rabbi Kaplan told JTA that he was "very pleased" with the police decision.

"It was nothing unexpected," he said. "All of the accusations were hearsay [and] untrue, and for that reason I have no concern."

Kulanu executive director Justine Apple said that although the police probe "seems fair," she was disappointed with the decision. Apple said Kulanu is seeking an apology from Rabbi Kaplan to his congregation and that "perhaps [he] even make a statement to the general Jewish LGBTQ in Toronto apologizing."

She added that Kulanu may ask for a meeting with Rabbi Kaplan.

WHO WE ARE

Motek Productions is a Toronto based entertainment agency specializing in booking the most famous Israeli artists in cities across North America. Since its initial days, Motek Productions has been sharing with the world what Israel has to offer. Our roster features artists from many different styles of contemporary Israeli music such as: pop, classic rock, hip hop, world, and more.

WHAT WE DO

Motek Productions believes in making a difference in how Israeli culture is viewed around the world. By bringing Israeli artists to North American communities, we are exposing Canadians and Americans to the cultural side of Israel, contributing to already diverse cultures. With the consistent negative portrayal of Israel within the media, we believe that showcasing talented Israeli artists in the community will allow a broader understanding and appreciation for the country of Israel.

Being more than just a booking agency, we have become an integral part of the Jewish community of Toronto. In addition to organizing events and concerts, we strongly believe in giving back to the community, and consistently participate with, and contribute to many organizations.

We also value the creation of unity in Toronto's Jewish community. Motek Productions' events and concerts allow the large Israeli and Jewish Canadian population to strengthen and unite. In addition, by promoting Israeli culture, the Jewish population is encouraged to get in touch with their roots, and the Israeli population is inspired to never lose sight of where they came from.

Our friends, our enemies and ourselves

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz
Special to The CJN

My synagogue was recently in the news. On a cold January night, vandals broke the windows of six different Montreal shuls, including my own, an attack that was reported in media worldwide. In 2011, even a small wave of antisemitism is big news.

The fact Jews still have real enemies is to some a bit of a shock. This attack provided an ugly reminder that even in democratic countries, antisemitism is still very much alive. Our synagogue's broken window shows that Jews still have real enemies.

At the same time, the aftermath of this attack also demonstrated how many friends our community has. I got a call from federal Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff and an e-mail from the minister of immigration, Jason Kenney. My inbox was a veritable interfaith gathering, with multiple responses from ministers, priests and imams.

Most touching was a note from the grandson of a Dutch man who had defended Jews from the Nazis and died in Sachsenhausen because of his activism. He wrote me to say that he would continue his grandfather's legacy, and do anything he could to protect the Jews.

Let's be clear: 2011 is not 1938. The Jews are integrated into the mainstream, and most Canadians see an attack on Canadian Jews as an attack on Canadians, just as most Americans would see an attack on American Jews as an attack on Americans.

Contemporary acceptance of Jews is remarkable by any standard. Sadly, the people who seem to show the least enthusiasm for Judaism are the ones who matter most: young Jews.

Guest Voice

It's sad that it takes a broken window to get Jews to think about their Judaism. In the aftermath of this attack, I heard from people I rarely see in shul. Like many North American congregations, most of our members visit infrequently, and, beyond the High Holidays, the synagogue is forgotten most of the year in the absence of incidents such as those last month.

British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks jokes that the one way to fill up synagogues would be by putting up large signs outside declaring "no Jews allowed," because contemporary Jews would be certain to join any institution that would refuse them membership. He's absolutely correct. Jews have had enormous success battling hatred and discrimination. We have made our way into country clubs that once restricted membership, and moved into once-restricted neighbourhoods. But we're finding it much more difficult to handle success, and as we enter the mainstream, we leave our Jewish identities behind.

The Jewish world has changed in the last 100 years. We still have enemies, some as vicious as 100 years ago. But today we have many more friends and are a North American success story. What has changed the most is that Jewish identity is increasingly defined by what we oppose: antisemitism, terrorism, and Holocaust denial. Otherwise, we have only the vaguest idea of what it means to live as a Jew.

But antisemitism may eventually fade away. If so, what will become of Jewish identity?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz is the spiritual leader of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem in Montreal.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

A perfect game

It is rare indeed when one looks to professional athletes for moral guidance. We long ago learned that the extraordinary talents they possess are manifest primarily in the physical realm. It should be of no surprise that people who are worshiped by millions and paid enormous sums of money to play games have difficulty in the moral sphere.

This problem isn't limited to athletes and helps explain why our sages, while appreciating the tremendous benefits of wealth and its attendant power, were leery of both, fearing the harm it could do to one's character. When one is blessed with great wealth, one must work harder and harder on moral development.

Professional athletes, perhaps more than others, have the capacity to use their enormous influence for the benefit of society. And thankfully, many are actually involved in various charitable endeavors. Sandy Koufax, in refusing to pitch in the World Series on Yom Kippur, likely had a greater impact on the Jewish people than even the most inspiring of Yom Kippur services.

Gil Meche of the Kansas City Royals retired recently. It's rare when the retirement of a career 84-83 pitcher toiling for a last-place club merits much coverage, especially in an article devoted to Jewish business ethics. But this was no typical retirement. He retired to ensure that he would not be paid the $12,400,000 he was guaranteed for the final year of his contract. "When I signed my contract, my main goal was to earn it. Once I started to realize I wasn't earning my money, I felt bad... Honestly, I didn't feel like I deserved it. I didn't want to have those feelings again."

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The baseball world was stunned. When a team signs a player, they expect to pay him. Collecting oodles of money regardless of performance is, sadly, part of baseball, and so many other business cultures. Collecting such pay may be perfectly legal, but it falls short of the standard for those who aspire to a life of moral excellence.

The Talmud, commenting on the verse "He speaks truthfully in his heart" (Psalms 15), relates that the fourth-century sage Rav Safra was approached by someone who wanted to buy an article from him. When his original offer was ignored, he upped the offer and was again greeted by silence. When Rav Safra broke his silence, it was to announce that he would accept the original offer, explaining that he was reciting the Shema and could not respond. But, despite no legal obligation to do so, Rav Safra insisted on making good on his acceptance of the original offer, the one he accepted "in his heart."

In a society that's governed by supply and demand and intense competition for perceived talent, salaries for executive positions are often many hundreds, and even thousands, of dollars above those of average workers. I will leave it to you to ponder whether the much greater salaries paid to movie stars, athletes and CEOs compared to brain surgeons, teachers and social workers reflects the scarcity of the former compared to the latter, or rather reflects the fact that we value the former more than we do the latter.

Troper writes about Jewish politics in 1960s Canada

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

The '60s was a crucial decade for the culture and values of much of the western world. Its music and its political, cultural, sexual and intellectual values are still, to a surprising extent, part of the fabric of Canadian society. Can the same be said about the Jewish values, culture and politics of the Canada of 50 years ago?

Harold Troper, one of the leading historians of the Jews of Canada, has just published The Defining Decade: Identity, Politics, and the Jewish Community in the 1960s (University of Toronto Press), a detailed study of Jewish politics and identity in Canada in the '60s. Troper makes a compelling case that this decade was crucial to the development of Canadian Jewry. In 1960, Canadian Jews were a fairly timid community with little political clout. By the end of the decade, they were not afraid to speak out loudly, if not always effectively, on issues of communal concern.

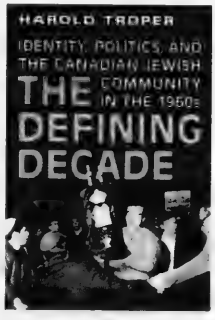
Troper's book is based on interviews and painstaking archival research, and is well footnoted, yet it is written in an accessible and readable style. In fact, the style borders on the casual, with scattered statements like, "Of course, Jews are Jews," or "How were Duplessis and his party viewed by most Montreal Jews? Like pigs at a bar mitzvah," or "This initial organizational meeting did not go any smoother than any meeting of Jews might be expected to go."

Troper is a master raconteur. He tells a number of gripping and entertaining stories in great detail: for example, the Jewish reactions to the planned Canadian Nazi Party demonstration in Toronto's Allan Gardens in 1965; the community reaction in 1968 when Larry Zeidel, a Jewish National Hockey League hockey player, was the victim of antisemitic taunting on ice and took the law into his own hands; the negotiations between Montreal Jews and the local school board where, in some neighbourhoods, Jews made up a very high percentage of the students in the "Protestant" schools; the lengthy and vitriolic battle between the Jewish community and the anti-Zionist Rev. A.C. Forrest of the United Church (particularly acute right after the Six Day War in 1967) and Jewish agitation against the exclusionary membership policies of Toronto's Granite Club.

As Troper writes in his introduction, he had originally planned to write a book specifically about the effect of the Six Day War on Canadian Jewry and only subsequently decided to expand his research to all the issues of the '60s. But this book still contains an extensive chapter about the Six Day War showing the impressive maturation of the Canadian Jewish community into a force for fundraising and political lobbying for Israel. Troper analyzes the salutary effect that that war had on Jewish identity and pride in Canada, and explains the realignment of political power inside the Jewish community in the wake of the war.

(While the book seems carefully edited, I was surprised to see the claim, on page 179, that UN Resolution 242, passed on Nov. 22, 1967, called for "the immediate and total withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from all territories occupied in the war." In fact, that resolution said nothing about the timing or extent of any withdrawal, purposely using the ambiguous language "withdrawal from territories," and not "withdrawal from the territories," and certainly not "from all territories.")

The book will be of interest to anyone who cares about the contemporary Canadian Jewish community, since so many of the issues on our agenda today (e.g., fights about public funding for Jewish schools or questions about how to deal with leftist anti-Israel agitation on university campuses) were issues already then. Readers like me who lived in Canada in the '60s will find the book of even greater interest as it breathes life into old memories. (While I am not certain, I think that, in the picture on the cover of the book of the 1968 post-Simchat Torah demonstration for Soviet Jewry in Nathan Phillips Square in Toronto, I am the teenager with the embarrassingly long sideburns shown in profile at the right side of picture.)



Troper has decided to concentrate his analysis on political issues – both the politics of the Jewish community lobbying local, provincial and federal governments, and the internal political squabbles of the Jewish community. The countercultural forces of the '60s can be seen clearly in the way that many Jews rebelled against Canadian Jewish Congress and other elements of the traditional communal governance structure.

At over 300 pages, the book is probably long enough. But I couldn't help noticing that a number of aspects of Canadian Jewish life in the '60s were omitted or mentioned only in passing. There is a wonderful story yet to be told about the vast growth of Jewish educational institutions in Canada in the '60s. Jewish studies in Canadian universities also began then thus enriching Canadian Jewish intellectual life. Hebrew and Yiddish culture thrived in the '60s in many Canadian cities in a way that was almost unheard of south of the border.

There was also an extremely rich religious-intellectual life in Canada in the '60s. When I think about Toronto, the city that I know best, I am amazed that at one point in those years, in an area just two or three kilometres long, you could find Rabbi Gunther Plaut, Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg and Rabbi Walter Wurzburger, all writing impressive books and articles in English that were being read widely, putting Canadian Jewry on the intellectual map of, respectively, Reform, Conservative and modern Orthodox intellectuals throughout the world. And just a few kilometres away from them, you could find Rabbi Gedaliah Felder and Rabbi Avraham Price writing erudite books and articles in Hebrew that are still being studied and cited throughout the world among students of rabbinic texts. Another religious intellectual, Rabbi David Hartman, was active in Montreal for much of the '60s. (Of these six rabbis, only Rabbi Plaut and Rabbi Rosenberg are mentioned in the book, and only for their political activities.) I'm hard-pressed to think of any decade of greater religious-intellectual creativity in Canada before or since.

Still for those who are interested in the political side of Jewish identity issues in Canada of the 1960s, Troper has written the definitive book.

George Brown dean lauded for role in new campus

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Lorie Shekter-Wolfson, the woman credited as the visionary for George Brown College's new $175-million campus on Toronto's waterfront, won the 2010 Colleges Ontario Award for exemplary service for her leadership role.

Shekter-Wolfson – the Waterfront Development's assistant vice-president and the dean of George Brown's community services and health sciences department – said she was "totally honoured, surprised... that people felt that strongly that I should win something like this."

The award is presented annually to recognize individuals, organizations and volunteers who have made an outstanding contribution to the advancement of Ontario's college system.

Since Shekter-Wolfson joined George Brown in 2002, she has pushed forward with a vision that has literally changed the face of Toronto.

George Brown will welcome health-science students in September 2012 to its third campus overlooking the Toronto Harbour on the waterfront.

The campus will house a dental health school, a health and wellness school, a services management school, and a nursing school, with informal learning spaces, rooftop terraces and state-of-the-art labs.

The fact that the new campus will be a major part of Toronto's waterfront development is something she can't take all the credit for, said Shekter-Wolfson.

She said she initially proposed that George Brown's new campus be housed on King Street near the St. James campus.

"We were approached by Waterfront Toronto. They didn't just want residential towers because they wanted education, they wanted some industry, residential, stores, and so a number of educational institutions were approached," Shekter-Wolfson said.

"Waterfront Toronto was very impressed with our concept, with our vision for education... and they were trying to create a vision of health and wellness down there. A centre for health sciences fit that vision and this was a marriage made in heaven."

John Milloy, minister of Training, Colleges and Universities, left, and Tony Tilly, chair of the college presidents' committee, Colleges Ontario, present the 2010 Colleges Ontario Award for exemplary service to Lorie Shekter-Wolfson for her role in bringing George Brown College's new campus to Toronto's waterfront.

In addition to putting her stamp on the waterfront with George Brown's new campus – which has been granted $61.5 million from the province, $30 million from the federal government and about $25 million from the college, with plans for the rest of the money to come from Waterfront Toronto and private donors – Shekter-Wolfson has also had a major role in changing the way health professionals learn and work together.

Shekter-Wolfson, who has worked as a clinician, an administrator, an educator and a consultant in the health-care system, has insisted on an interprofessional education strategy to improve the health-care sector by promoting a more collaborative, team-based approach to patient care.

"Even though we do sometimes work in teams, coming from my many years of living and breathing the health-care system, I feel there is a huge need to improve the way we work as teams to ensure better safety for patients," she said.

Part of the vision that would change the curriculum to introduce new skill sets to health-science students, she added, was a new space.

"From day one, I said... if we're going to try to create this opportunity for students and faculty to work closely together to develop curriculum together and offer it, in some case, jointly, then we need to look at a space that will enable that."

With an initiative on this grand scale, Shekter-Wolfson said she was met with many obstacles.

The first challenge was to bring her peers and colleagues on board with her concept of interprofessional education.

"When I first started, I felt like a lone wolf. But now it's becoming much more prevalent."

She said that there were challenges when it came to the construction because the campus is being built on land that has never been developed before.

But despite the challenges, they are making huge progress and the feedback has been very encouraging, she said, adding that the biggest reward is watching elements of her vision come to life.

When Shekter-Wolfson sat in on a presentation given by one of her staff members on the curriculum that George Brown will offer in its health-sciences program, she thought, "three years ago, I never would have heard this. That is hugely rewarding."

She said she was also thrilled when she learned about the commitment from the government to help fund the project.

"[That] really showed that there was a lot of confidence in what we were doing.

"And, of course, when we actually started digging – I mean, you can talk about it, but until then it was all theoretical... Then one day there is a crane down there... and I thought, 'Holy cow, this is now happening.'"

Collaborative program keeps seniors connected to community

UJA Federation's Seniors' Task Force creates Healthy @ Home

By Daniel Horowitz

According to geriatric specialists, living an isolated life, that is a life without connections to family, friends, neighbours or colleagues, carries the same risk of early death associated with smokers or those who are severely obese.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto created the Seniors' Task Force, chaired by Lionel Robins, to find creative ways to keep our seniors healthier and happier and in their own homes longer.

The Task Force, comprised of a number of talented and committed volunteers and staff agencies that serve seniors, quickly paid dividends to the community by creating several initiatives, the cornerstone of which is Healthy @ Home.

Responding to the growing number of seniors across the GTA – many of whom are isolated because of either low-income, frailty or the fact that they are newcomers – Healthy @ Home creates supportive communities, bringing social, recreational, educational, cultural and health programs to where seniors live. The hope is that the program will keep seniors healthier and stimulated, thus preventing premature onset of depression and other ailments, delay institutionalization and allow them to remain active members of the community.

Phase I of Healthy @ Home introduced the program to apartments on the Bathurst Street corridor, between Steeles and Lawrence. Last week, Phase II was launched in York Region with participants enjoying a healthy lunch, program orientation, music and dancing. Nearly 300 seniors have benefited so far.

"I didn't want to get involved in something just for the sake of being involved, I wanted to get involved in something that I have a chance to make better," explains Robins, who is no stranger to communal involvement thanks to his efforts on behalf of UJA Federation, the Bernard Betel Centre and Princess Margaret Hospital, to name but a few. "But the real motivation for me to become involved was because of what I saw happen to my mother. At one time, she was the most upbeat person, but she was ultimately put into a much smaller, more isolated environment and went downhill quickly. But, when I would take her up to the lake on weekends, where she sat, chatting with others, she was her old self again. It was like Jekyll and Hyde."

The program is delivered by a collaborative group of Jewish agencies including the Bernard Betel Centre (as the lead agency), Baycrest, the Jewish Russian Community Centre and JIAS Toronto. Funds for the program come from multiple sources including UJA Federation, the Bernard Betel Centre, the Pearl Langer Fund and the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. Healthy @ Home is operated efficiently because of in-kind contributions and volunteers who assist with the program.

"I find this whole experience so fulfilling, personally," says Robins. "Especially now, as I see the resources we have, the needs that are out there, and the people we have on board who are meeting those needs, I believe we are on the right track. We have a lot of great people collaborating for the greater good, we have a great process in place, and, like a snowball rolling down a hill, we continue to gain more momentum and we continue to transform many lives for the better."

"As the convener of the Seniors' Task Force, we are excited to see the combined skills of our community's great seniors' agencies, and our passionate lay leaders, come together to create initiatives such as Healthy at Home," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "I am confident that these talented and motivated individuals will continue to make great strides in ensuring that our seniors live their lives with the respect and dignity they deserve."

UJA Carmel Fire Fund raises close to $300,000

By Howard English

To the casual eye, Israel's Carmel forest is a serene symbol of Israel's northern beauty. Until you notice blackened trees and charred earth, remnants of a raging fire that started December 2 last year and ended up taking 44 lives. The scene is still beautiful but scarred by tragedy.

For 26 members of UJA Federation's Winter Family Mission, the Carmel forest tour was both tearful and fulfilling. Tearful because so many innocents became victims of an unpredictable inferno, and fulfilling because mission participants met some of the people who will benefit from the $280,000 raised by nearly 1,500 donors, through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Carmel Fire Fund.

At the Haifa fire station, whose firefighters were the first to battle the blaze, mission co-chairs Gil & Elisa Palter presented a $25,000 cheque from the fund to the men who confronted the fire. But more than money, the memory of Danny Hayat, 35, who died during the blaze, weighed on the minds of his colleagues and dear friends.

Students at Bialik Hebrew Day School hold a cheque for UJA's Carmel Fire Fund (l-r) Gal Dekel, Dan Shechner, Sandra Gans and Adam Levin

"It's very difficult to talk about Danny after everything that happened," said Amir Banias, deputy chief of the rescue team. "He was the best friend, the best commander. The fire fighters at this station cry at night for Danny. His family is now our family." Danny's wife, Hofit, gave birth to a baby girl, Elah, less than three weeks after her husband died.

"It was gut wrenching to hear the heartfelt tributes to Danny Hyat from his colleagues, every single one of whom had tears in his eyes when they talked about Danny. You could see from their body language that they were in both shock and pain from his tragic death," said Gil Palter.

Mission members also met Roni Sofer, a daring Israeli photographer who rescued three people from the raging blaze,

UJA fire fund proceeds are also helping the youth village of Yemin Orde, which suffered considerable fire damage, to rebuild. "The children were very frightened," recalled village representative Yisraela Tadela. "It took many days for them to calm down."

Other urgent fire fund-supported activities include counseling for those who suffered trauma, in addition to emergency shelter and respite activities for evacuees.

In Toronto, students at Bialik Hebrew Day School did their part for the fund, raising more than $3,300 to assist fire victims.

"Each day, we made a conscious decision and a deliberate effort to bring in the coin of the day," said Bialik student Julia Sebastien. "It was amazing to hear the PA announcements each afternoon telling us the total for the day and the week."

JPPS stakeholders to get vote on merger plan

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The proposal to merge with United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah High School (UTT/Herzliah) will be put to a vote by major stakeholders, parents of Jewish People's and Peretz Schools/Bialik High School (JPPS/Bialik) were told last week.

JPPS/Bialik president Arnold Cohen explained later to The CJN that the school system's bylaws require that parents, donors and alumni be given a say before a merger, closing, sale or acquisition of a school takes place.

When the vote will be held or how it will be conducted has not been determined, but he did indicate it would be binding.

Close to 500 parents attended a closed information session at Bialik Feb. 2 to hear for the first time officially what the schools' boards are planning, in cooperation with Federation CJA.

Parents of UTT/Herzliah met simultaneously at Herzliah. They, however, are not constitutionally entitled to a vote on such decisions, president Charles Leibovich said, and there is no intention to have one.

"We will be consulting everybody and getting their feedback," he said.

Cohen said this doesn't mean the future of the project rests with one partner. The board of either school could put an end to project or change its mind on the timeline.

However, both boards approved the merger plans last fall.

Cohen felt that most parents at his school's meeting left reassured that the merger makes sense, but that it's "not a done deal."

He described the meeting as "the beginning of a consultation process," and that when sufficient input has been gathered the matter will be voted upon. "Nothing is guaranteed... nothing is inevitable," he said.

Leibovich said that about 200 parents attended his school's meeting, which he described as "a roomful of passionate people who care about their school.

"This is the beginning of a dialogue. It's hard at the beginning. People want more details," he said.

Smaller meetings are starting this week for parents at both schools. JPPS/Bialik also has an e-mail address for inquiries and an interactive website for discussion is in the works.

At the same time, a "transition committee" is being formed that will include parents and staff to oversee the move to merger, scheduled to be completed by August 2013.

The goal is to create a "community" school that can accommodate a broad spectrum of Jewish observance and ideology.

The total projected enrolment is 2,175. The two schools today have more than 1,800 students combined.

Many JPPS/Bialik parents were relieved to hear from Cohen that their children would not have to adopt Orthodox practice such as wearing kippot or reciting prayers in a merged school, and the admissions policy would be a liberal one. The school would accept children not deemed Jewish by Orthodox standards, either because of their matrilineage or the denomination that certified a parent's conversion.

UTT/Herzliah enforces Halachah in its selection of students.

Leibovich said he's confident that parents of UTT/Herzliah , which has a more religious and Hebrew orientation, will come to accept that the "pluralistic" school envisioned is "a way of teaching respect of others" and realize it will be welcoming to those who are more Orthodox or traditional.

Federation president Jack Hasen, who is observant, spoke at the UTT/Herzliah meeting.

The letter of intent for the merger plan stipulates that kippot be worn during Judaic studies and at other appropriate times, which has gone some way to reassure UTT/Herzliah parents.

A merged school would be large enough to accommodate a wide range of Jewish studies options in its curriculum, the school leaders say.

UTT/Herzliah has a little more than half the number of students as JPPS/Bialik, which has about 1,200. The former has experienced the more serious decline in enrolment and financial problems in recent years, which is the reason for the downsizing to a single campus. When first proposed in 2007, the idea was met with strong opposition from parents and the St. Laurent Jewish community. The federation will be assisting the schools in raising funds for the construction of the two new schools.

In separate Jan. 31 letters sent to parents, the school leaders wrote that the federation has assured them of "significant" funding for the merger project. The secrecy that surrounded the project until little more than a week before the parents' meetings was due to the desire to be confident that it was viable, they say.

Documentary screened despite Iranian objections

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It's been called the movie the government of Iran did not want you to see, but last Sunday 370 defiant theatre goers and free speech advocates sat down to view the Canadian premiere of Iranium.

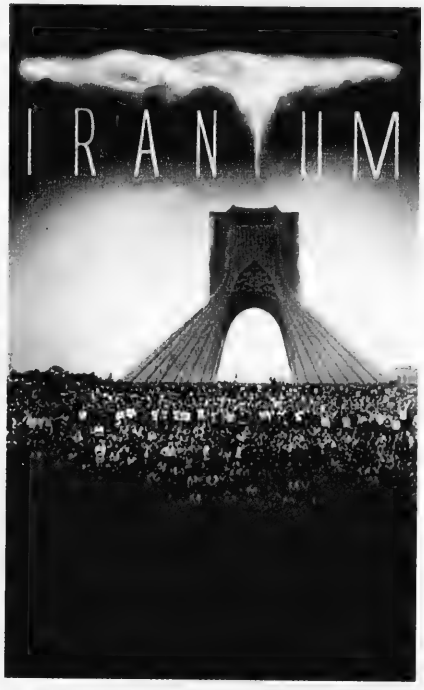
They crowded Library and Archives Canada (LAC), the Ottawa institution that last month cancelled screening of the film.

LAC acted after receiving complaints from the embassy of Iran, followed by threatening phone calls and suspicious letters that required the presence of the police hazardous materials team. Citing security concerns, the library cancelled the film's screening, which was originally scheduled for Jan. 18.

The national library's decision was overturned by National Heritage Minister James Moore, who addressed the crowd at the LAC.

"The Iranian embassy will never dictate what movies we watch in Canada," Moore told the audience, according to the Ottawa Citizen. "President Ahmadinejad, you have no right to extend the theocratic bullying arm of your government onto Canadian soil in a building, an agency, of the government of Canada, a stone's throw from the Parliament of Canada. You will not tell the government of Canada, you will not tell a single Canadian, what movie we can or cannot watch."

Earlier, the minister said he was "disappointed that Library and Archives Canada chose not to show the film ... due to threats of violence."



The minister's intervention was cheered by Fred Litwin, founder of the Free Thinking Film Society.

"I applaud the Minister of National Heritage, James Moore, for his determination in standing up for freedom of speech – but it should never had had to go to his office," Litwin said.

The library should not have caved in to threats in the first place and "police should have provided extra security," he said.

Police and security guards were out in force during the screening, which sold out despite coinciding with the Super Bowl.

Addressing the audience, Litwin credited the Iranian Embassy for the large turn out.

"I want to send them a case of the finest Israeli wine," he joked. "I really owe them a debt of gratitude."

In addition to the support of political commentators, Litwin received dozens of e-mails from Iranian emigres who were concerned about the reach and brazenness of the Iranian government. "'My family and I thought we'd left this behind when we left Iran and now they have influence here,'" Litwin quoted them as saying.

The 60-minute film traces the history of Iran's nuclear ambitions, its threat to international stability, Iran's sponsorship of international terrorism and the repression of its citizens. It also outlines various scenarios that could arise should Iran develop nuclear weapons.

Litwin created the Free Thinking Film Society four years ago to screen films of a conservative or libertarian perspective that he felt were being ignored by Ottawa movie houses. Among the films screened by the society are, The Stoning of Soraya M; Reclaiming Pride, a story about a Toronto gay activist's efforts to oppose anti-Israel advocacy at the Toronto Gay Pride Parade; Crossing the Line: The Intifada Comes to Campus; Atomic Jihad; and The Battle Over Durban II. From Nov. 12 to14, 2010 the society hosted its first annual Free Thinking Film Festival.

Abbas to visit Canada to meet Jewish leaders

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas will visit Canada "within the next six months" specifically to have a "meaningful dialogue" with a cross-section of Canadian Jewry, The CJN has learned.

"It is confirmed," Liberal MP Irwin Cotler disclosed in a recent interview in his Mount Royal riding office. "The raison d'etre for his visit to Canada is to meet with the Jewish community.

"The idea would be that he would meet with a representative group [of Canadian Jewry]," Cotler said. "Organizational heads, students, academics, business people, rabbinic leaders – a cross-section, for an open dialogue."

The only Jewish community figure made aware of the visit so far is Canada-Israel Committee CEO Shimon Fogel, Cotler said.

The Foreign Affairs Ministry is not involved with arrangements for Abbas' visit, he said.

It was arranged privately between Abbas and Cotler over the holiday season during one of Cotler's regular visits to the Middle East, held in part to confer with officials in Israel, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and the PA.

However, the meeting between Abbas and the Jewish community is being hosted officially by Cotler and the bipartisan committee he formed, the joint House-Senate Committee on Middle East Peace and Reconciliation.

The committee includes Cotler's fellow Liberal MP, Bob Rae, as well as Conservative senators Linda Frum and Hugh Segal.

Efforts by The CJN to reach Fogel and the parliamentarians for comment were unsuccessful at press time.

As part of the visit, Cotler also expects Abbas to meet with "government people, parliamentarians, and the like." The Foreign Ministry could conceivably be involved in that part of the trip, Cotler said.

He said Abbas, whom he first met in 1977 and has maintained contact with ever since, indicated to him last fall that he wanted to meet with Canadian Jewish leaders. Abbas previously has met with Jewish leaders in the United States and France.

While in the Middle East, Cotler met for three hours with Abbas and with PA Foreign Affairs Minister Riad Malki in Ramallah.

Cotler said Abbas and Malki were open to the idea of having a Canadian serve as "referee" in a revived Israeli-Palestinian group monitoring "incitement," which is present in PA textbooks, media and mosques.

But he also quoted Abbas as saying that while he doesn't deny that incitement against Israel takes place in the PA, "I'm not going to play the blame game. There's also incitement on the Israeli side."

Meeting with Netanyahu a week after Abbas, Cotler said the Israeli prime minister was also receptive to the idea of reviving the incitement-monitoring group, with a Canadian presence.

Netanyahu also indicated to Cotler his willingness to go to the PA to speak with Palestinians, as Abbas previously has done in Israel.

Cotler reported that Abbas reacted favourably to the idea of designating "one or two" Palestinians to be part of the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism. He said Abbas expressed regret that he couldn't attend the coalition's conference last November in Ottawa, although he did send a statement.

Similarly, Cotler related that Netanyahu was pleased by the adoption of the Ottawa Protocol at the conference and indicated his desire to attend the next one.

Things are "proceeding apace," Cotler said, in efforts by Canada to reform the PA's justice sector, efforts, he noted, that he's pleased to see continuing under the Tory government.

Cotler would like to revive the idea of holding a "justice summit" for justice ministers from interested nations, a project he began after becoming justice minister in 2003 but which never saw the light of day when the Liberals were defeated in 2006.

On the peace process, Cotler said he emphasized to both Abbas and Netanyahu the importance of direct negotiations without preconditions on the overriding issues of security and borders.

"I said [former Egyptian president Anwar] Sadat and [former Israeli prime minister Menachem] Begin made peace because of direct and sustained negotiations," Cotler related. "There were no Europeans, no international community, no Americans."

A deal was achieved then and is possible now, Cotler believes, because each leader has the capacity to "carry the country" with a deal in hand and is "looking for his place in history."

Jewish Children/Youth with Complex Challenges Need Loving Homes

BY: JO MICHAELS

I recently had the privilege of meeting Joseph*, a three year old little charmer, and Abby*, a funny, passionate 12 year old girl.

Joseph and Abby are two of the 90+ children currently in the care of Jewish Family & Child, (the only Jewish Children's Aid Society in Ontario) and they share a common bond - they both have challenges they are striving to overcome.

I was taken with Joseph the moment we met. His warm smile and kind eyes could melt the hardest of hearts.

Joseph was born with neurological impairment resulting in vision and hearing loss. Because of his challenges, he is behind on several developmental milestones; however, JF&CS is working diligently with Joseph's current foster family and community resources to ensure he reaches his potential.

As Joseph grows he will require ongoing rehabilitation, a special school and possibly specialized equipment. Plain and simple - Joseph requires a long-term home to provide a stable, supportive environment which will meet his complex emotional, social and physical needs. Currently, he attends therapies several times a week and it is expected this will continue.

Joseph needs a loving family that will not only understand how to tend to his unique needs, but who will be a strong advocate to ensure he receives the services he requires at school and in the community.

He would do best as the only child in a family, or where he is the youngest child with a number of years between him and the next child, but what Joseph especially needs is a committed, long-term caregiver who is experienced and strives to meet his therapeutic needs.

Caring for Joseph requires stimulation and ongoing exposure to sensory activities. He requires a highly structured, stimulating environment.

Challenges aside, Joseph is a truly delightful little boy with a great deal of personality and a lot of love to give a family.

Abby and I really hit it off when we realized that despite our age difference, we both loved the Twilight movies! I learned quickly that her favourite part of the day is the music program at her day treatment centre. She loves to sing and says the best songs are "the ones you can really dance to!"

Abby has a fairly severe intellectual disability and as such needs understanding and a high level of supervision. She often has behaviour challenges, but can be redirected with skill and patience. Abby, much like Joseph, needs a loving, long-term family who will work closely with the staff at her treatment centre and who will be proactive in learning how to manage problem behaviours that arise from her learning challenges and cognitive delays.

JF&CS struggles to find homes that offer permanency and the possibility of adoption for children like Abby and Joseph. They understand healthy attachments; they know that children need stability and security whenever possible. Unfortunately, despite best efforts, it remains a challenge.

If you think that you (or someone you know) can provide the type of home and care these children need, there is no time like the present to contact JF&CS and change the life of a vulnerable, Jewish child.

New fund aims to empower women

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Women helping women is the idea behind Ottawa's newly constituted Women's Collective Endowment Fund (WCEF).

The goals of the WCEF, recently launched as a fund of the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation, are "to engage, educate and empower women to become catalysts for change [by] supporting initiatives that strive to expand and improve opportunities and choices in the lives of women and children."

The organizing committee had hoped to have 20 founding members paying $500 each to launch the fund. Instead, it welcomed nearly 30 women to its initial program, and many more are waiting to join.

As its opening event on Jan. 23, the WCEF joined forces with the local chapter of Soup Sisters, a volunteer group of women who gather once a month to make soup, package it and deliver it to a women's shelter.

In groups of four and five, the women worked at various stations in the commercial kitchen of Urban Element, guided by a professional chef and Soup Sisters volunteers. They chopped and stirred, following the recipes provided, filling the air with the aromas of four different varieties of homemade soup.

What could be better on a freezing cold winter evening than a bowl of steaming soup? "The soup will nourish the women and nourish their souls," said Lynne Oreck-Wener, who spearheaded the initiative.

"When the soup arrives [at the shelter], it will bring the message that there are kind people who care about them."

Rather than launch the collective with a luncheon or speaker, Oreck-Wener thought that the Soup Sisters project was the perfect initiative. "It is a hands-on experience, a practical experience of what this fund is supposed to do."

Oreck-Wener moved to Ottawa with her family in 1996 from Winnipeg, where there was a women's endowment fund, and she knows of a number of other such funds around North America. When she became a member of the board of the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation, she suggested starting one in Ottawa.

Having heard from a number of women that they'd like more of a voice in the community, she felt that a collective would enable women to feel included and empowered. But rather than look for a couple of major donors to provide start-up funds, Oreck-Wener decided to enlist 20 women who would each contribute $500 to come up with an initial $10,000.

"The amazing thing is that people came on board and even told friends... every women loved the idea of women giving to women." Since more than 20 women donated $500 each, others will be able to become involved from now on by contributing $100 each.

Once the money has been invested for a year, interest will be available for distribution. In the meantime, guidelines for applying for funds will be drawn up, with the money earmarked to improve the lives of women.

CJPAC opens Edmonton office

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) recently opened a new Western Canada office in Edmonton and appointed Eleanor Johnston as its regional director.

Johnston, a Toronto native in her 30s, will be primarily responsible for Vancouver, Victoria, Edmonton, Calgary, Saskatoon and Regina.

Eleanor Johnston

The mandate of this national independent organization is to engage the Jewish community in the political process so as to advance relationships with Canada's political community and foster Jewish and pro-Israel leadership.

"CJPAC feels Western Canada is important enough that we need to reach out to the Jewish community on the ground, instead of traveling from out east," she said. "I'll be speaking to Jewish community leadership, young people, anyone who's interested in politics, who's pro-Israel and wants to advocate on behalf of Jewish causes."

Johnston takes over in Western Canada

The organization hopes to give individuals and communities the tools to communicate their messages on a political level. "It behooves us as a community to get our voices heard by those who make decisions," Johnston said. "We need to reach politicians on various levels, get them engaged in the Jewish community and get our message out."

Johnston said she will spend most of her time travelling and meeting with various groups in the cities she's responsible for.

"One-third of Canadian MPs come from Western Canada. We know that if our community's voice is to be heard, we need to be reaching out to the unique Jewish and pro-Israel communities of Western Canada," said CJPAC executive director Mark Waldman.

Johnston spent the past two years as senior special assistant in communications and parliamentary affairs for Peter Kent in his former role as minister of state and foreign affairs for the Americas (he was recently named environment minister). She began her parliamentary career as a Canada-Israel Committee intern with Tory cabinet minister Stockwell Day and was quickly hired to run Day's parliamentary office. She later worked as assistant to Dave MacKenzie, Conservative MP for Oxford.

"I certainly understand the system in Ottawa, and I'm eager to work professionally with the Jewish community, something I've been doing voluntarily for years," she said. "I'm so glad to be part of CJPAC. I've been watching them for years. I know this will be a challenge but I'm looking forward to doing some really good things in Western Canada."

Chava Rosenfarb
Grande dame of Yiddish literature

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A gathering to remember Chava Rosenfarb, one of the last of the acclaimed Yiddish novelists, was held last week in Montreal, her home for nearly 50 years. She died in Lethbridge, Alta., Jan. 30 at age 87.

Rosenfarb's magnum opus was the gritty epic Der boim fun lebn, later translated as The Tree of Life, a 1,000-page fictional work based on the hardships she witnessed in the Lodz Ghetto during World War II. Most of her work, which also includes poetry, stories, essays and plays, concerned the Holocaust or prewar Jewish life.

She was the recipient of Israel's prestigious Manger Prize in 1979, among other international literary awards.

Born in Lodz, Poland, in 1923, Rosenfarb had lived in Canada since 1950, when she immigrated with her former husband, Dr. Henry Morgentaler, later to become Canada's foremost abortion-rights activist.

After they divorced in the mid-1970s, she divided her time between Montreal and Melbourne, Australia, with her partner Bono Wiener, a childhood friend, until his death in 1995. In 1998 she moved to Toronto and, in 2003, to Lethbridge, where her daughter, Goldie Morgentaler, is a professor of English at the University of Lethbridge.

Goldie translated several of her mother's works into English. Some were also translated into Hebrew.

In 2006, Rosenfarb received an honorary degree from the university, making her the first Yiddish writer to be so recognized by a Canadian university.

The daughter of a restaurant waiter and textile factory worker, Rosenfarb grew up in a family devoted to the Jewish Socialist Bund.

As a teenager in the ghetto, Rosenfarb began writing poetry and joined the underground literary milieu. She and her family were deported to Auschwitz in August 1944, from there she, her mother and sister (now Henia Reinhartz of Toronto) were sent to the Sasel labour camp, and finally to the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, where they were liberated.

Her father, they learned, had been killed on a transport out of Dachau, when the train was bombed by the Americans near war's end.

After the war, in Brussels, Rosenfarb began working on The Tree of Life, which was eventually published in the original Yiddish in 1972.

"It is one of the few novels, as opposed to memoirs or autobiographies, to be written by an actual survivor of the Holocaust," her daughter noted. "[It] was immediately hailed as a masterpiece by the Yiddish press, which repeatedly emphasized its unique place in the literature of the Holocaust."

Rosenfarb was unusual for having achieved status as a Yiddish novelist, traditionally a male domain, and some have argued she was the greatest woman writer of Yiddish ever in any genre. She also brought a realism to her female characters that was not common in the Yiddish canon.

The Manger Prize jury extolled the three-part book as "tower[ing] powerfully over the Jewish literature of the Holocaust."

Chava Rosenfarb

The trilogy follows the fates of 10 Jewish inhabitants of the Lodz ghetto, from varied walks of life, from 1939 until its liquidation in 1944. Although fictional, Rosenfarb based the head of the Judenrat (the Nazi-appointed Jewish council) on the real-life Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, a controversial figure because of the power he wielded.

Despite her wartime experience and half-century of writing, Rosenfarb felt she never adequately communicated the enormity of the Holocaust. "I have very great doubts about whether Holocaust literature is possible," she said in Montreal in 2004. "Even for a person like myself... what I write is only an echo of the reality."

For that reason, she avoided any direct depiction of the horrors of the concentration camps.

The Tree of Life was published in English in Australia in 1985 and re-issued from 2004 to 2006 in three volumes by the University of Wisconsin Press.

Rosenfarb began to write seriously after settling in Montreal, a mecca for Yiddish culture. She counted luminaries such as Melech Ravitch, Rochl Korn and I.I. Segal, a generation older than her, as friends. Her first published work was the poetry collection Di balade fun nekhtikn vald (The Ballad of Yesterday's Forest) in 1947.

Later, with two children, writing had to be confined to the wee hours of the morning. There were other challenges. As Goldie recalled, after her brother was born in 1956, her father, also a Lodz native, decreed that Yiddish was no longer to be spoken at home. Abraham Morgentaler is now a doctor in Boston.

Her second-best-known novel was 1982's Bociany, the name of an imaginary Polish village and based loosely on the lives of Rosenfarb's parents. She translated this work herself into English, and it was published by Syracuse University Press, earning her the 2000 John Glassco Prize of the Literary Translation Association of Canada.

A series of short stories written in the 1980s about (mostly female) Holocaust survivors' often troubled postwar lives in Canada was translated by her daughter and published by Canada's Cormorant Press in 2004 as Survivors: Seven Short Stories. It won the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Award.

Morgentaler regrets that her mother's work is not better known outside the Yiddish-speaking world. "Her fate as a writer thus reflects the general isolation of Yiddish literature from the mainstream of world literature, an isolation that has unfortunately grown more profound with time," Morgentaler wrote.

At a tribute to her at Concordia University in 2004, Rosenfarb lamented the disappearance of Yiddish literature. "In my 54 years here, a desert has replaced the forest," and she feared that writing in the mamaloshen would be "dismissed as merely a curiosity."

"My hope is this treasure will never perish, but bear witness to the spiritual triumph of our people and enrich generations to come."

Abe Arnold
Historian was a community leader

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Abe Arnold, who died Jan. 28 at age 88 after a lengthy illness, was a historian who documented Jewish life in Canada, as well as a national leader on the left in Canadian Jewry and a pioneer in fighting for enhanced civil rights in Canada.

Abe Arnold

"He was a remarkable man," said journalist Martin Zeilig, a longtime friend. "He had a vigorous intellect and boundless energy. He could be cantankerous at times, but I think that's what kept him going."

Roz Usiskin, another close friend of Arnold's, worked with him in many areas during his active years in Winnipeg. "We were both involved in the founding of the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada [which Arnold led from 1968 to 1975], United Jewish Peoples Order programs, in Outlook magazine and in founding the Joseph Zuken Memorial Association," she said. (Zuken was a long-serving Jewish Communist city councillor in Winnipeg.)

"Abe was always full of ideas. His historical research into Jewish life in Canada was amazing. He put out a prolific amount of writing. And through his work in civil rights, he was very influential in the country as a whole."

Arnold was born in Montreal in 1922. His formal education included business college, journalism and public relations. Before coming to Winnipeg in 1965 to serve as western regional director of Canadian Jewish Congress, he served as an editor in Toronto (1946-49) and in Vancouver for the Jewish Western Bulletin (1949-1960). He also worked as public relations director for the Jewish Federation/Combined Jewish Appeal in Montreal (1960-65).

As a historian, his major works were Jewish Life in Canada, published in 1976, and Judaism: Myth, Legend, History and Custom from the Religious to the Secular, a study of Jewish history and tradition from a secular humanist perspective, which was published in 1995.

He contributed chapters to several other books and wrote numerous articles for Jewish publications, including The Canadian Jewish News, the Jewish Post and News in Winnipeg, Canadian Jewish Outlook in Vancouver and Humanistic Judaism, which is published in Detroit. He was also a contributor the Beaver, Canada's history magazine.

In 1978, Arnold helped found the Manitoba Association of Rights and Liberties (MARL) – along with Usiskin – and he served as its first executive director (until 1988). For his work with MARL, he was honoured in 1994 with the Manitoba Human Rights Achievement Award as a "life-long advocate of human rights and civil liberties."

Winnipeg's Jewish community bestowed on him one of its Shem Tov awards in 1997. He also received an honorary doctorate from the University of Winnipeg in 2001 and was appointed a member of the Order of Canada in 2004.

Zeilig last saw Arnold a couple of weeks before he died. "He was frail but still alert," he said. "Despite having his activities restricted due to illness, he still retained his interest in the community."

Arnold is survived by his wife of 66 years, Bertha, his son, Mark, and his family in Toronto, and daughter, Shelley, and her family in Winnipeg. He was predeceased by his daughter, Frances.

Understanding Get legislation

Family Matters

A lot of people have asked me: "Isn't it unjust or true that only a man can initiate a Get or Jewish Divorce? If true, doesn't this mean that a woman can get stuck waiting for the man to start the process forever?

In fact, although one or the other Jewish spouse has sometimes denied his or her consent for a Get — or tried to use that power to consent as a "bargaining tool" in exchange for rights of custody, property or other financial deals — the ability to initiate a Get is grossly misunderstood and misinterpreted by much of the public. When the right to consent is abused, then the courts in Canada, particularly in Ontario, have the ability to deny such a spouse the right to have access to the Courts on the application of the spouse who requires a Get.

In 1986 and 1991, I crafted and helped introduce new laws to Ontario's Family Law Act and Canada's Divorce Act that allowed a spouse who required a Get to apply to a Judge who now has the ability to "strike the pleadings" of any spouse who refuses to provide his consent to a spouse's religious remarriage. This means that if a spouse refuses to provide or consent to a Jewish Divorce, a Judge could deny him or her relief, such as a Canadian civil divorce, custody or access to his/her children, property rights, spousal or child support or the right to defend any application for such rights. And the problem doesn't just affect women, who if they don't obtain a Jewish divorce and remarry can give birth to children who in observant Judaism may have trouble marrying other Jews, except for Jews like themselves or converts (these people are called "mamzers" to the tenth generation).

In fact a recent study in Israel has shown that actually more women are holding up men for a Jewish divorce then the other way around (surprise)! In any event, although procedurally, it is the man who "gives" the woman the divorce document or Get when the Jewish divorce ceremony is officiated by a Jewish Court or "Beth Din", either the man or the woman can initiate the process by calling the Rabbi or clerk of the Jewish Court to make an appointment for the ceremony itself. If the other spouse refuses to come to the Beth Din, then family, Rabbinical and community pressure often succeeds in persuading that spouse to attend. If not, then sometimes one has to resort to the Canadian Get legislation, although the fact is that it is rarely used, which is a testimony to its success.

Laws are often enacted for their moral utility. Many people are aware that using the Get as a bargaining tool is no longer sanctioned by Canadian law, and that awareness of the Get Law in and of itself has become a deterrent. In a 2008 Quebec case (Bruker v. Markovitz), Justice Rosalie Abella of the Supreme Court of Canada commented very favourably on the Get law as follows: "Section 21.1 of the Divorce Act, which gives a court discretionary authority to rebuff a spouse in civil proceedings who obstructs religious remarriage, is a clear indication that it is public policy in this country that such barriers are to be discouraged. As the comments of the then Ministers of Justice show, these amendments received overwhelming support from the Jewish community, including its more religious elements, reflecting a consensus that the refusal to provide a get was an unwarranted indignity imposed on Jewish women and, to the extent possible, one that should not be countenanced by Canada's legal system."

UBC student government approves flotilla funding

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Jewish students at the University of British Columbia learned last month that the Alma Mater Society Council, the university's student government, voted to approve the transfer of $700 from student fees to the Canadian Flotilla to Gaza.

The funds were moved to the flotilla, which aims to set sail in the spring, via UBC's Social Justice Centre (SJC), a student-funded entity that's controlled by members of the group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR).

The school's Israel Awareness Club (IAC) and the Vancouver Hillel Foundation had argued that student fees should remain on campus or be transferred through legitimate aid agencies. They suggested that activists raise their own donations for their causes on campus and not use student fees for this purpose.

President Bijan Ahmadian was the only AMS council member to vote against the transfer at the Jan. 26 meeting. The rest voted in favour or abstained.

The issue came to light in early December, when elections at the Social Justice Centre's annual general meeting were spontaneously cancelled. Many Jewish students attended the meeting hoping to elect new leaders for the SJC and reverse its support for funding the Canadian flotilla.

Students complained to the Alma Mater Society that due process had not been followed at the SJC meeting, and the AMS quickly froze the SJC's financial accounts until it could discuss the matter further. In the interim, SPHR targeted AMS council members and Ahmadian, demanding through phone calls and e-mails that the funding be released immediately.

To counteract this, Hillel students circulated a petition on campus insisting that the AMS take control of the SJC and freeze all funding until fair and transparent elections were held.

The AMS' investigation into the issue involved the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and FINTRAC, an agency that tracks suspicious financial transactions. Ahmadian told the Toronto Star that the AMS was "concerned the funds would be going to support terrorism, so we asked FINTRAC if they have any records, and they just told us they have nothing to be suspicious of."

"I'm concerned about the use of student fees for something that does not benefit students," he told The CJN.

"Personally, I've always said that fees collected from students should be used for students, and not wired offshore for causes. Our legislative procedures committee is now considering passing legislation so that in future, student fees cannot be used toward donations, only towards improving student life."

Ahmadian said that although he voted against the use of SJC funding for the flotilla, "I can't control the council."

Vancouver Hillel president Eyal Lichtmann said he wasn't surprised council voted in favour of the transfer.

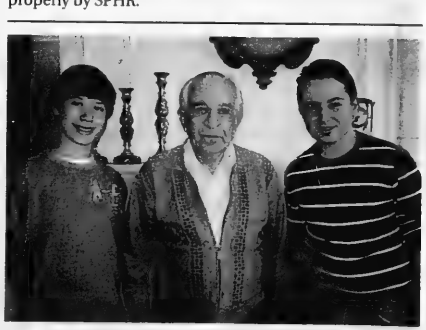
"Members of the Israel Awareness Club always knew that the sacrosanct independence of 'resource groups' meant the council would almost certainly rubber-stamp the transfer," he wrote in a statement. "The IAC's victory comes from the fact that council was forced to look very deeply at the legality and morality of this transfer. More importantly, IAC members educated thousands and thousands of peers on campus about the realities of Israel's efforts to prevent weapon transfers into Gaza and the decades of attacks on civilians Israel has faced."

He said he believes the AMS' approval of the funding contravenes the advice of its legal counsel.

"We provided them with evidence that the Canadian Flotilla to Gaza is not a peaceful mission. People on board have publicly declared that they intend to run the blockade and they're prepared for violence. But the Canadian government has indicated that the blockade is legal. This is an illegal act, and the AMS is funding it."

In a statement to supporters on its website, the SJC said: "It has been a long three months of fighting and we are relieved that this battle is over and successful. We are proud of the AMS council for doing the right thing in this situation. Moreover, we are thankful for all of your support throughout this entire ordeal. We would not have been successful if it wasn't for your letter-writing, your attendance at the various meetings, and your overall support in general."

In an e-mail comment to The CJN, SPHR president Omar Shaban said that his group is "very happy that the AMS finally voted in favour of allowing the $700 donation. The fact that this happened demonstrates that intimidation, harassment and defamation do not work with SPHR, the SJC and even the AMS. The AMS council members voted in favour fully aware that this money is going to be used properly by SPHR."



GIVING THANKS: Robbins Hebrew Academy students Matthew Cohn, left, and Eli Feldman recently visited Harry Perlstein, a Holocaust survivor, at his retirement residence. The students thanked him for a gift he gave to the school that provides tuition relief to families requiring financial assistance. Perlstein said the gift was made to honour the memory of his wife, Rose Perlstein. Over lunch, he entertained the students with stories about his life and answered their questions about the Holocaust.

Canada, U.S., hope for democratic Egypt

By Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Whoever ultimately takes control of Egypt's government after President Hosni Mubarak relinquishes power should be ready to continue to honour the country's current peace agreement with Israel.

That was the message Lawrence Cannon, Canada's minister of foreign affairs, had late Sunday afternoon for all parties looking to form the next Egyptian government.

In a statement, Cannon noted that while Canada supports the Egyptian people "as they embark on this vital transition toward a more democratic system of government," the Canadian government expects "that any government that will emerge will uphold Egypt's commitment to international law, as well as all past peace accords and agreements, including with Israel."

Israel and Egypt signed a peace treaty in 1979 as an outgrowth of the U.S.-mediated Camp David Accords.

Cannon added that any reform to the Egyptian political system should make that country more, not less, stable.

"While the need for democratic reforms is pressing, reform should not occur in a vacuum that could result in extremism, violence and intolerance. All elements of any future government must never seek to attain political objectives through terrorism," Cannon said.

Also over the weekend, U.S. President Barack Obama said he was confident that an orderly political transition in Egypt would produce a government that will remain a U.S. partner.

In an interview with Fox News on Sunday, Obama also said the ideology of the banned, Islamist Muslim Brotherhood, Eqypt's best-organized opposition group, includes anti-U.S. strains.

But the Brotherhood lacks majority support, he said.

"What I want is a representative government in Egypt, and I have confidence that if Egypt moves in an orderly transition process, that we'll have a government in Egypt that we can work with together as a partner."

Obama said that only Mubarak, who took power in 1981, knows if he will leave office soon.

"But here's what we know – that Egypt is not going to go back to what it was," Obama said. "The Egyptian people want freedom, they want free and fair elections, they want a representative government, they want a responsible government. So what we have said is you have to start a transition now."

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton called for a broad cross-section of Egyptian political forces to be included in talks with the government to make sure that the Egyptian people's "legitimate aspirations" are met.

Clinton also stressed that incidents of harassment and detention of activists, journalists and other elements of civil society must stop.

But she also appeared to soften U.S. pressure on Mubarak to step down.

"We want to see a process begun that will lead to an orderly transition that has milestones and concrete steps that lead us toward free and fair elections," Clinton told reporters on board her airplane on Sunday while returning from a Munich security conference.

Egypt's vice-president, Omar Suleiman, a longtime intelligence chief, held unprecedented talks with the Brotherhood and other opponents of the regime on Sunday as demonstrators in Cairo's Tahrir Square, marking a "Day of Martyrs" for those killed in protests, said they would intensify their 12-day battle to end Mubarak's rule.

Mubarak has vowed to stay on until elections in September.

Protesters in Cairo vow to stay until Mubarak quits

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — Egyptian judicial officials have promised to start questioning three former ministers and a senior ruling party official this week, in the government's latest concession aimed at curbing the unrest that has wracked the country over the last two weeks.

The government is also expected to release a Google marketing manager who was detained during the anti-government demonstrations calling for the ouster of President Hosni Mubarak, who has ruled the country for 30 years.

Meanwhile, Mubarak's new cabinet met Monday for the first time since the government was reshuffled in the wake of the mass protests. Mubarak, who has refused calls to step down before September polls, has tried to focus on restoring order.

But protesters, camped out in Tahrir Square in the heart of Cairo, have vowed to stay until Mubarak quits, and hope to take their campaign to the streets on Tuesday and Friday.

Omar Suleiman

Vice-president Omar Suleiman met Sunday with representatives of the various opposition groups, including the outlawed Muslim Brotherhood, to begin negotiations over reforms and a transition to democracy.

The opposition groups said that the meeting was held in a positive atmosphere, but reiterated that they would not cease their protests until Mubarak and his guard were removed from power.

Suleiman, Egypt's former intelligence chief who is leading the government's management of the crisis, offered a series of new concessions, saying the government would no longer hamper freedom of press and won't interfere with text messaging or the Internet.

He proposed setting up a committee of judiciary and political figures to study proposed constitutional reforms that would allow more candidates to run for president and impose term limits on the presidency, the state news agency reported. The committee was given until the first week of March to finish the tasks.

The offer included a pledge not to harass those participating in anti-government protests, which have drawn hundreds of thousands at the biggest rallies.

One of the biggest fears of protesters is that if Mubarak or his close confidant, Suleiman, remain in power, they will exact revenge for the humiliating demonstrations by rounding up protesters and torturing them. Many protesters have reported seeing undercover security forces in the crowds every day, photographing the demonstrators with cellphone cameras.

Suleiman's offer to eventually lift emergency laws with a major caveat – when security permits – would fulfil a longtime demand by the opposition. The laws were imposed by Mubarak when he took office in 1981, and they have been in force ever since. They give police far-reaching powers for detention and suppression of civil and human rights.

Suleiman also proposed opening an office that would field complaints about political prisoners, according to the state news agency. He promised measures to fight corruption and to prosecute those responsible for the unexplained disappearance of police from Cairo's streets more than a week ago. And the government agreed to set up a committee including independent figures and members of the youth movement to monitor the "honest implementation" of all the new agreements.

Some prominent figures from Egypt's elite have suggested that there is a deliberate attempt by the regime to cling to power by offering just enough to satisfy some established opposition groups like the Brotherhood.

Abouel Ela Madi, an ex-Brotherhood member, said the regime hopes to draw the organization away from the other protest groups.

"If the regime manages to influence the Brotherhood, it will have a shattering effect. A bulk of the protesters belong to the Brotherhood and thus their talks might play a negative role in foiling the completion of the revolution," he said. "I hope they don't make this mistake."

Of all the opposition groups that met with Suleiman, the Brotherhood stands to gain the most. There have been no known discussions between the group and the regime at this level since Mubarak took power in 1981.

The Brotherhood won 20 per cent of parliament's seats in 2005 by fielding candidates as independents, but thousands of its members were arrested in crackdowns over the past decade and it failed to win a single seat last year in elections that were marred by fraud.

The Brotherhood's potential rise is a key concern of the United States and Israel, countries that have depended on Mubarak as an ally in the Arab world.

The Brotherhood aims to create an Islamic state in Egypt, but insists it would not rescind Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel and would not take hardline measures such as forcing women to cover up in public.

The Brotherhood did not organize or lead the protests currently under way.

It ordered its supporters to take part a few days after they began, sensing that the protesters, mostly young men and women using social networks on the Internet to mobilize, were able to sustain their momentum. Now the Brotherhood's followers appear to be growing in Cairo's Tahrir Square, the epicentre of the uprising.

Suleiman and Mubarak have blamed the Brotherhood for fomenting the unrest, which turned violent for a time early last week when Mubarak supporters tried to push protesters out of the square. But opening talks with the Brotherhood is a tacit recognition by the regime of its role in the ongoing protests as well as its wide popular base.

Iran proclaims 'domination' over Gulf

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran showed off new missile and satellite technology on Monday and said that it had "complete domination" of the entrance to the oil-rich Gulf.

As part of Iran's annual revolution celebrations, a time traditionally marked by new technological and military advances, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad unveiled locally made satellites, while a senior commander showed off mass produced missiles.

"We should reach a point where we will be able to provide our knowledge and technology in the aerospace field to other countries," Ahmadinejad said in a speech, unveiling the satellites he said were for scientific purposes, and showing film of a satellite-carrier rocket.

Although Iran is not engaged in any military conflict, it is on constant alert against possible attacks from the United States and Israel, which have not ruled out possible pre-emptive strikes to stop Tehran getting nuclear weapons.

Iran says it has no intention of making nuclear bombs and that its atomic program, which is the subject of U.S., European and UN sanctions, is entirely peaceful.

In 2009, Iran launched a domestically made satellite into orbit for the first time, a step that increased the West's fear that the Islamic Republic is seeking to build a nuclear bomb and missile delivery systems.

The chief commander of the Revolutionary Guards, Mohammad Ali Jafari, said the new mass-produced missile would be able to target enemies at sea.

"Its speed is three times greater than the speed of sound, and it cannot be traced and deactivated by enemies," official news agency IRNA quoted Jafari as saying.

Another Guards commander, Ali Fadavi, reiterated Iran's threat to close the Strait of Hormuz, the narrow channel through which 40 per cent of the world's seaborne oil trade passes.

"The Persian Gulf and the Strait of Hormuz are under the complete domination of the Revolutionary Guards ... and it would be blocked in case of a threat," he said, according to the semi-official Mehr news agency.

Foreign analysts say Iran would be reluctant to take such a drastic step as it would cut off its own oil exports.

The Arab revolution and western decline

Ari Shavit
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

Comment

After half a century during which tyrants have ruled the Arab world, their control is weakening. After 40 years of decaying stability, the rot is eating into it. The Arab masses will no longer accept what they used to accept, and the Arab elites will no longer remain silent.

As well, processes that have been roiling beneath the surface for about a decade are suddenly bursting out in an "intifadah" of freedom. Modernization, globalization, telecommunications and Islamization have created a critical mass that cannot be stopped.

The example of democratic Iraq is awakening other countries, and Al Jazeera's broadcasts of protests in the Arab world are fanning the flames. And so the Tunisian bastille fell, the Cairo bastille is falling and other Arab bastilles will fall.

The scenes in Arab countries are similar to the Palestinian intifadah of 1987, but the collapse recalls the Soviet collapse in eastern Europe of 1989. But no one knows where this "intifadah" will lead. No one knows whether it will bring democracy, theocracy or a new kind of democracy. But things will never again be the same.

The old order in the Middle East is crumbling. Just as the Free Officers Movement brought about the Egyptian Revolution in the 1950s, bringing down the Arab monarchism that had relied on the colonial powers, the 2011 revolution in the square is bringing down the Arab tyrants who were dependent on the United States.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak meets with U.S. President Barack Obama in happier times.

For some 60 years, the West gave the world imperfect but stable order. It built a kind of post-imperial empire that promised relative quiet and maximum peace. The rise of China, India, Brazil and Russia, like the economic crisis in the United States, has made it clear that the empire is beginning to fade.

And yet, the West has maintained a sort of international hegemony. Just as no replacement has been found for the dollar, none has been found for North Atlantic leadership. But Western countries' poor handling of the Middle East proves they are no longer leaders. Right before our eyes, the superpowers are turning into palaver powers.

There are no excuses for the following contradictions. How can it be that U.S. president George W. Bush's America understood the problem of repression in the Arab world, but Obama's America ignored it until last week? How can it be that in May 2009, Hosni Mubarak was an esteemed president whom U.S. President Barack Obama respected, and in January 2011, Mubarak is a dictator whom even Obama is casting aside? How can it be that in June 2009, Obama didn't support the masses who came out against the zealot Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, while now he stands by the masses who are coming out against the moderate Mubarak?

There is one answer: the West's position is not a moral one that reflects a real commitment to human rights. The West's position reflects the adoption of U.S. president Jimmy Carter's strategy: kowtowing to benighted, strong tyrants while abandoning moderate, weak ones.

Carter's betrayal of the Shah during the Iranian Revolution brought us the ayatollahs, and will soon bring us ayatollahs with nuclear arms. The consequences of the West's betrayal of Mubarak will be no less severe. It's not only a betrayal of a leader who was loyal to the West, served stability and encouraged moderation – it's a betrayal of every ally of the West in the Middle East and the developing world.

The message is sharp and clear: the West's word is no word at all, and an alliance with the West is not an alliance. The West has lost it. The West has stopped being a leading and stabilizing force around the world.

The Arab liberation revolution will fundamentally change the Middle East. The acceleration of the West's decline will change the world. One outcome will be a surge toward China, Russia and regional powers like Brazil, Turkey and Iran. Another will be a series of international flare-ups stemming from the West's lost deterrence.

But the overall outcome will be the collapse of North Atlantic political hegemony not in decades, but in years. As the United States and Europe bury Mubarak now, they are also burying the powers they once were. In Cairo's Tahrir Square, the age of western hegemony is fading away.

'Fall of Mubarak means decision time for Netanyahu'

Cohen doesn't predict all-out war, such as Israel faced in 1967. "No, what we'll have is what we have in Lebanon – semi-state-affiliated terrorist organizations operating autonomously from the government, fighting proxy wars for Iran, with a government that's not strong enough to stop them or do anything about it. Except instead of one front, we'll have it on all sides."

Harvard Law School professor Alan Dershowitz raises another potential consequence for Israel – that a hostile Islamist leadership in Egypt will lead to the end of Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations.

In "The Egyptian revolution may produce a Lebanon-type Islamic regime" which Dershowitz wrote for the Huffington Post, he said, "The first casualty may well be the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians. The Palestinian Authority will be emboldened by the prospect of a powerful military ally on Israel's border. The Israelis will be reluctant to surrender any more territory if they can no longer count on peace with Egypt (and perhaps with Jordan)."

The worst-case prospect of an all-out regional security crisis has been a painful reminder to some Israelis of the state's existential fragility. Ha'aretz commentator Aluf Benn pondered how the state will protect itself, given that the current defence structure is based on peace with Egypt and that military values have eroded over the years.

"And who exactly will be serving in this expanded army – the ultra-Orthodox and Arabs, who are more or less exempt from conscription? Or maybe the immigrants from Eritrea and Sudan, who already know the lay of the land?" Benn asked in "The fall of Mubarak means decision time for Netanyahu."

Are Israelis afraid for the future? If they are, you would never know it from the mood on the streets, where everything is business as usual. Then again, as Cohen said, "Haven't you noticed that Israelis are never openly fearful? Even in the heat of the war in Lebanon, when there were missiles falling, people didn't seem outwardly fearful. It's just the Israeli way."

On the more optimistic side are those Israelis who are inspired by the calls for democratic reform in Egypt and anticipate the positives of gaining a democratic Arab neighbour. One such Israeli is Anshel Pfeffer, who wrote a column called "Why should Israel be the only democracy in the Mideast?" for Ha'aretz.

Some believe that if democracy emerges, it will mean an even stronger and more reliable brand of peace with Egypt. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu alluded to this possibility in a recent speech covered by Ha'aretz. "As much as the foundations for democracy are stronger, the foundations for peace are stronger," he said.

Others who are inspired by Egypt's democratic movement are less hopeful about its outcome. "It's a revolution that I think is happening for all the right reasons but is going to have all the wrong results," Cohen said.

"It was inevitable. These Arab dictatorships are so oppressive that resistance was bound to erupt. But it's a rebel without a cause thing. It's people saying what they don't want, but no one leading, and when no one leads, whoever is most powerful takes over and in this case, it looks like it will be radical Islamists," she added.

Even if the revolutionaries get the democracy they are fighting for, Israel may still suffer dire consequences.

In an interview on the Global Research in International Affairs Center website, director Barry Rubin reviewed the latest Pew poll.

"In Egypt, 30 per cent like Hezbollah… 49 per cent are favourable toward Hamas… and 20 per cent smile… at Al Qaeda. Roughly speaking, one-fifth of Egyptians applaud the most extreme Islamist terrorist group, while around one-third back revolutionary Islamists abroad," Rubin said.

"Asked if they supported 'modernizers' or 'Islamists,' only 27 per cent said modernizers, while 59 per cent said Islamists… This doesn't tell us what proportion of Egyptians want an Islamist government at home, but it is an indicator."

The neighbouring Arab country may become democratic, but as Totten writes in "Egypt needs liberalism," it doesn't mean Egyptian society's popular values will be conducive to positive relations with Israel.

Ynet op-ed writer Avi Trengo said in "Peace in Egypt's interest" that no matter what happens, Egyptian peace with Israel will remain intact because of economic interests, and the fact that many of Egypt's economic ties to the United States are contingent on the maintenance of peace with Israel.

Others, like man-on-the-street Moshe Lazar, are not so sure. "One of the things that stops Egypt from attacking Israel is American support," says the 36-year-old Tel Aviv resident, who is a captain in an Israel Defence Forces reserve infantry unit. "But Muslim extremists don't care about that."

Lazar says the best-case scenario for Israel is the Egyptian military taking over and stabilizing the country. "Everything else, starting with a fragile coalition and ending with the Muslim Brotherhood, is not going to be good for us."

Lazar's view echos Mideast expert Daniel Pipes opinion in "Turmoil in Egypt" in the Washington Times. "Heavy-handed rule will lighten somewhat in Egypt and elsewhere, but the militaries will remain the ultimate power brokers," Pipes wrote.

Rothschild Café dweller Roee Mizrachi, 34, from Givatayim, said she is less certain about what the future will bring. "Who knows? It could be good for Egyptians, it could be bad. It could be good for Israel, it could be bad. My honest opinion is who the hell knows," she said.

"It's way too early to know, and as we've seen, everything can change in 24 hours."

Journalists targeted by rioters as 'Jews'

JTA

Pro-Egyptian government counter-protesters in Cairo were screaming "Jew" at foreign journalists, apparently spurred by Egyptian state TV accusations that Israeli spies are behind the protests.

"Egyptian state television has actively tried to foment the unrest by reporting that 'Israeli spies' on the unrest have infiltrated the city, which explains why many of the gangs who attack reporters shout 'yehudi,'" Al Jazeera said in a report on its website last Thursday.

The report documented increasing attacks on foreign journalists.

The Obama administration has condemned such attacks and called on the Mubarak regime to rein them in.

In related developments, four Israeli journalists arrested in Cairo were released as rival protests in Egypt turned violent.

The reporters — three from Israel's Channel 2 and one from the Nazareth news media — were released on Feb. 2 after being arrested earlier in the day for violating the curfew in Cairo and entering the capital city on tourist visas, according to reports.

"We call on all Israeli reporters arriving in Cairo to remain alert, act responsibly and honour the place's rules," the Israeli Foreign Ministry said in a statement.

On the night of Feb. 2, automatic weapons fire was heard in Tahrir Square in downtown Cairo after anti- and pro-Egyptian government protesters were ordered to leave the area. Tanks were seen moving into the area.

Violence had escalated during the day with Molotov cocktails burning surrounding buildings and pro- and anti-Mubarak demonstrators attacking one another with metal rods. Egyptian police used water cannons to disperse the crowds and put out fires.

Some 600 protesters were reported injured in the street violence and one police officer was killed, according to reports.

In an address to the Egyptian people on Feb. 1, Mubarak said he would not run in the next elections, scheduled for September, and said he would lead an orderly transition of power.

The army took to state television on Feb. 2 to urge protesters to leave the streets and return to everyday life.

Also on Feb. 2, Yemen's President Ali Abdullah Saleh said he would step down at the end of his presidential term, ending three decades in office. Saleh's term expires in 2013. He promised not to pass on his leadership position to his son.

NGO probe approved

The Knesset House Committee approved the establishment of parliamentary panels to probe the funding and activities of left-leaning human rights groups and NGOs. The vote to set up two commissions of inquiries passed Feb. 2 by a 10-6 vote. One committee will investigate the involvement of foreign governments in the funding of Israeli left-wing groups. The other will look into Israeli organizations trying to delegitimize the Israel Defence Forces. The opposition Kadima Party voted against the panels and has refused to allow its MKs to serve on them.

Galant app't nixed

The appointment of Israel's new military chief of staff was cancelled because of a scandal over personal real estate. Maj.-Gen. Yoav Galant had been set to succeed Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi this month. Galant allegedly took over several acres of public land near his home on a moshav in northern Israel. The cancellation came Feb. 2 after Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein said the legal difficulties made it difficult to back the appointment. Weinstein left it to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak to decide whether to go ahead with it. State Comptroller Micha Lindenstrauss also conducted an investigation, which also recommended that Galant's appointment be rescinded. On Feb. 3, Galant filed an appeal with the Supreme Court. Israel Defence Forces' deputy chief of staff, Maj.-Gen. Yair Naveh, was named interim chief of staff while a new candidate is vetted. Galant's appointment was approved in September after Ashkenazi wasn't asked to extend his four-year term by a year, as is traditional.

Cabinets meet, deals signed

Seven new bilateral agreements were signed in Israel at a joint meeting of Israeli and German cabinet ministers Jan. 31. The agreements dealt with bilateral socio-economic and cultural relations, according to the Israeli Prime Minister's Office. It marked the third consecutive year that the two cabinets have met in a joint session. In a private meeting before the session, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and German Chancellor Angela Merkel reportedly spent much of the time discussing the unrest in Egypt. Merkel also called on Israel to stop building in West Bank settlements, saying it hurts the peace process, Ha'aretz reported.

Website hacked

The website of the Jewish People Policy Institute was hacked Feb. 3 by a group the institute says is affiliated with Hamas. The JPPI, a Jerusalem-based think-tank that focuses on the Jewish future and Israel's security, said hackers took over its website, then posted a picture of an Israeli tank and a Palestinian child on the English section, and removed a recently uploaded assessment and analysis documents. JPPI says the group that hacked its site has ties to Hamas. "The hackers' website is identified with the Hamas movement and we know for sure that they are operating from the Gaza Strip," a spokesperson said.

Ruling on ORT dispute

World ORT and ORT Israel can both use the ORT name for fundraising purposes, Israel's Supreme Court ruled. A three-judge panel decided Jan. 31 that the two Jewish school systems can use the name in Israel. Its ruling settles a dispute that featured years of appeals. It said both parties own the original name and that World ORT could use the name "World ORT" in English only. World ORT was also awarded $10,000 in legal fees. World ORT and ORT Israel had been one organization for more than a century before a nasty split in 2006. At that time ORT Israel, which runs a system of vocational schools in Israel, won a lawsuit in an Israeli District Court giving it the sole right to use the name ORT for fundraising in Israel. World ORT, a global network of Jewish vocational schools with roots dating back to 19th-century Russia, had been using its Hebrew name, Kadima Mada, to raise money in Israel since 2006.

Carter named in lawsuit

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Lawyers in the United States and Israel have launched a class action law suit against former U.S. president Jimmy Carter and his publisher, Simon & Schuster, over Carter's book, Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid.

The complaint alleges that Carter violated the state's consumer protection laws, which make it unlawful to deceive anyone "in the conduct of business, trade or commerce."

Legal documents filed in U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York claim the book was marketed on the basis that it "provides an accurate, factual record of historical events and key agreements related to negotiations between Israel and Palestinian Arabs."

Purchasers relied on Carter's reputation as an ex-president with the expectation the book would provide an accurate representation of events. "In truth, however, the book is filled with demonstrable falsehoods, omissions and knowing misrepresentations intended to promote Carter's agenda of anti-Israel propaganda, rather than a true and accurate picture of all matters and events."

Among the approximately 50 factual misrepresentations cited in the court document was Carter's claim that UN Resolution 242, as well as the Camp David Accords and the Oslo agreement, specified that Israel should withdraw to the borders it held prior to the 1967 Six Day War. "Even a cursory reading of the UN document reveals that it does not provide what the defendant [Carter] represents it does."

Another "material falsehood" alleged in the complaint is Carter's assertion that Israel's eastern border with the Palestinian territories is internationally recognized. "In fact," states the complaint, "the international borders of Israel have never been finalized. This was acknowledged in the Camp David Accords signed between Israel and Egypt on Sept. 17, 1978, which defendant Jimmy Carter both negotiated and signed."

Carter allegedly misrepresented the facts when he states in the book that the United States has had a policy since 1949 that Israel's borders must coincide with those that existed from 1949 to 1967. The complaint states that assertion is a "blatant inaccuracy."

Carter also claims that former prime minister Ariel Sharon rejected most of the key provisions of the Quartet's roadmap for peace, while the Palestinian leadership accepted it. The court document states there is no evidence the Palestinian Authority cabinet even discussed the issue while the Israeli cabinet endorsed the plan by a 12-7 vote.

Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, the Israeli lawyer who conceived of the suit, said she was approached by readers concerned about the book's depiction of Israel as an apartheid state. "We were looking for a way to attack it and the way was that he was marketing the book as a factual book and it's not. It violates the Consumer Protection Act in the United States."

Filed in conjunction with U.S. lawyer David Schoen, the suit was novel and "unprecedented," Darshan-Leitner admitted. It asks the court on behalf of five named plaintiffs and thousands of others to refund the $27 (US) purchase price and to declare the book "deceptive." She estimates total damages could reach $5 to $6 million.

The suit, she acknowledged, amounts to "lawfare. This is our way of using the law in order to fight the people who attack Israel

"This is an unprecedented law suit and if it is accepted by the court, it raises the chance that people will be sued for raising lies and deception about Israel. They'll think twice about raising lies and deceptions about Israel."

In Toronto, lawyer Bert Raphael said Nitsana-Leitner has broken new ground in the past by obtaining judgements against terrorist organizations on behalf of their victims.

Suits like the one against Carter "shake people up," said Raphael.

"From that point of view, it would embarrass him, and if it goes to trial he'd be asked about the truth of his comments. It will affect his credibility...It will bring it down to reality and show how biased and anti-Israel he is," said Raphael, who corresponded with Carter on behalf of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

Adam Rothberg, a spokesman for Simon & Schuster, called the lawsuit "frivolous.

"It is a chilling attack on free speech that we intend to defend vigorously."

Med students learn to communicate

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — We've all sat face to face with them at some point: doctors with no bedside manner and inadequate communication skills. The ones who barely make eye contact, don't appear to care very deeply about our condition and show a remarkable deficit of compassion and kindness. For the lucky among us, those encounters have been rare. And with more widespread training for med students, they'll become even rarer.

Gone is the assumption that doctors can and will cultivate their own bedside manner based on their particular personalities. The new generation of medical students are being trained to show patients a caring attitude. And if their compassion doesn't make the grade, they don't, either.

"Communications research has demonstrated that when patients have started to talk to a doctor, the average length of time before the doctor interrupted them was 18 seconds," says Debbie Altow, a communication skills instructor at the University of British Columbia's medical school.

"Our communication skills course is trying to ensure that when doctors interview patients, especially for the first time, they are able to listen and understand more about the patient. We aspire to teach them to develop a relationship with the patient, understand their living situation and the cause or source of their condition. We're trying to focus medical students on the needs of the patient, so that they remember that a visit with the doctor is all about the patient, not about the doctor."

At the University of Western Ontario's Schulich School of Medicine & Dentistry, first- and second-year students are required to take a course titled "Patient-Centred Clinical Methods." Using actors standing in for patients, students are taught how to conduct interviews, how to deal with angry patients and how to further their communication skills. The course has been offered for the past 15 years, says Dr. Terri Paul, associate dean.

"We know from studies that communication skills are some of the biggest issues that physicians face when it comes to dealing with patients," she says. "The vast majority of complaints about physicians are due to poor communication skills. While we don't have hard evidence that courses like these are making a better generation of doctors, we'd like to think that's true."

Fail the communications courses and your progression to the next level is curtailed. At Western, the first two years of medical school are mostly class-based. To move ahead to clerkship in third year, you have to pass the communications class. "There's always been an issue of students failing the course or needing remediation," Paul says.

Likewise, at UBC, if students fail the communications course, they're required to re-take it. "At the end or the course, they're given an objective-structured clinical exam, where they're graded on interviewing," Altow says.

Failure isn't common, although she adds, "Most of the medical students are very accomplished and bring global work and personal experience to their studies. Their communication skills are often already well-developed."

Paul agrees and attributes the advancement of students' communications skills to the criteria for admission to medical school. "Grades are still important, but the process for admission includes communication skills and experience in volunteering. As a result, the type of person that's coming into medical school today is very different from the student of 20 years ago."

Banks, technology, commodities could shine in 2011

Eytan Avriel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Even though the recent World Economic Forum's annual summit in Davos, Switzerland, was thronged by bankers, economists, and people from insurance and accounting – all of whom are, in a word, investors – the topic of investments hardly arose.

In the cold air of the Alps, the burning topics were geopolitics, global economics, the imbalances of the economic blocs, the unequal distribution of income, and social responsibility. All the same, here are some ideas for the bemused investor of 2011.

1. The big banks mustn't fall. In the event of an existential threat, the state will step in even as they declare the intentions of expanding further around the world. Evidently, nobody has the political clout to stop them.

The same applies to Europe. At Davos, all the European leaders piously declared allegiance to the euro and the euro zone. But all know that their main motivation is to keep the huge banks of Germany, France and Britain stable. These banks hold vast amounts of debt issued by Greece, Spain, Ireland, Portugal and so on. The banks' collapse would bring down whole countries.

Your conclusion as an investor: buy shares and bonds of these banks, because governments will create the conditions for them to continue to prosper and gradually shed all that garbage on their balance sheets. It's true of Israeli banks, too. At the height of the crisis, the Bank of Israel declared it wouldn't let Israel's banks fall.

2. The future belongs to technological innovation. At Davos, we saw clearly how countries are competing over who will train the most engineers, invest the most in education and initiate the most complex engineering projects (China will, of course).

The consensus is that the leader in technological innovation will lead economic innovation as well.

Your conclusion as an investor: anticipate huge stock offerings by the likes of Facebook, Groupon, LinkedIn and other Internet and technology companies. Buy technology. It's hot.

3. The next crisis will come from India and China. They're supposed to be the new empires, the locomotives pulling the world economy, but that doesn't mean they can't falter. Economists are seeing worrying signs.

Economist Simon Johnson postulates that India will be to blame because of its mounting debt and its political system, which seems incapable of making hard decisions. A Bloomberg poll of international investors found that 45 per cent expect a crisis in China in the next five years.

Another 40 per cent think the crisis will come, but only after 2016. China is in the grip of a credit-fuelled speculative bubble, they say. It can't stop until there's a crisis or the economy slows down.

It's impossible to predict when any of this might happen, of course. But wary investors should cut back holdings in Chinese or Indian shares or bonds.

4. Commodity prices are rising. The people at Davos expect western economies to recover and predict strong economic growth in the east, Russia and South America. Translated: people will consume more and commodity prices will rise.

Already agricultural commodity prices have been soaring, setting off riots in North Africa. The predictions include shortages of water, oil, agricultural commodities and agrochemicals.

5. The rich will grow richer. The gap between the rich and poor will widen further. You might deplore the trend and wonder about ways to reverse it, but as an investor, you could pick companies that specialize in products and services for the wealthy. The wealthy feel like bingeing again. Companies that make yachts, planes and brand-name goods are likely to do well in 2011.

6. The U.S. dollar won't be the world's reserve currency forever. Signs of things to come were clear in the thin air of Davos. As the Chinese and Indian economies continue to boom, their leaders' confidence mounts. After years of frustration and nagging inferiority complexes, India and China are preparing for the day they take the reins of the world. And in a world like that, be it in five or 15 years, there's no reason to think the dollar will keep its status.

This is not an investment recommendation. It's a very long-term prediction. In any case, making predictions in the currency market is a sure way to lose money. But if you're putting aside money today for your pension tomorrow, or saving for the grandkids, think about this. One day America won't be pre-eminent anymore, and neither will its currency.

Egyptian unrest threatens Suez Canal

Eran Azran
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The biggest risk to the world economy stemming from the unrest in Egypt is a disruption of operations at the Suez Canal, say economists at Clal Finance, one of Israel's largest financial institutions.

"The primary question is whether the events in Egypt are material to the world economy," Clal macroeconomics analyst Amir Kahanovich said.

Some 10 per cent of all of the world's ships pass through the Suez Canal over the course of a year, and two million barrels of oil are shipped through the waterway on a daily basis, Kahanovich wrote. If the cost of passage through the canal goes up because of a takeover of the route by gangs, for example, or acts of sabotage, that would have worldwide impact, he added.

The Egyptian economy is in fact not very large, but some companies and sectors are exposed, such as European banks, airlines and tourism firms, said the Clal team.

Egypt's gross domestic product is $217 billion (all figures US). Its debt is $177 billion. For the sake of comparison, Greece's debt is more than $400 billion, Kahanovich said.

Uri Birman, director of Clal's global desk, said that the commodity sector, including oil, gold and agricultural products are attracting attention as a result of the disturbances. Oil rose in the midst of the disturbances. "The prices are the result of rising concern rather than the extent of supply," he said. "If the crisis spreads to the Gulf states, that would send prices sharply higher, but currently most assessments are that it won't: the regimes there don't have the negative image of Mubarak's."

Suez Canal

To head off the chance that rising food prices would cause instability, some countries in the region might stock up on commodities, which, together with other global macroeconomic factors, could increase prices, Birman said.

Balanced biopic examines movie mogul

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

American movie mogul Harvey Weinstein has the demeanour of a fish monger, the soul of an artist and the temperament of a street fighter.

He is the subject of a balanced biopic, Unauthorized: The Harvey Weinstein Project, which is due to open at the Bell Lightbox theatre (350 King St. West) on Feb. 10. Barry Avrich's documentary highlights Weinstein's contributions to a cutthroat industry and describes him as a person.

He and his low-key brother, Bob, built Miramax, the film distribution company, into a major Hollywood player in the late 1980s and 1990s.

As well as redefining the art-house marketplace by promoting independent and foreign films, they reshaped the nature of Academy Award campaigning.

The films they've produced and distributed, from Shakespeare in Love and The Reader to Il Postino and The Crying Game, have won an astonishing 292 Oscar nominations and 67 Oscars. Not bad for two Jewish brothers raised in a working-class milieu in New York City.

Harvey Weinstein

Avrich, a Toronto filmmaker whose last documentary on Tinseltown was on Lew Wasserman, the legendary entertainment kingpin, brings a critical eye to his latest film. He could easily have performed a hatchet job on Weinstein. Instead, he paints a nuanced portrait of a driven, abrasive, restless and imaginative entrepreneur.

Weinstein is probably best summed up by two Hollywood insiders who appear on screen. The first one calls him as "a tough, tough guy with incredible taste." The second one claims he is "50 per cent genius and 50 per cent asshole."

Beyond any doubt, Weinstein is a controlling individual who seeks to massage his image. Avrich asked him for an interview, but he declined, saying he did not want this film to be made. Speaking of moguls in general, Avrich told me, "If they can't control the story, they don't want to be part of it."

Unable to solicit Weinstein's co-operation, Avrich worked around him, interviewing people like director Martin Scoresese, journalist Peter Bart and Toronto International Film Festival chief executive officer Piers Handling. Avrich portrays the young Weinstein as a "dreamer" who yearned to escape a dreary future and thirsted for respectability and acceptance.

Thanks to his father, Max, a diamond cutter, Weinstein learned to love and appreciate movies. His mother, Miriam, imbued in him an ambition for achieving the American dream of wealth and status.

The brothers began as concert promoters and segued into the film business when they formed Miramax, which was named after their parents. They operated out of a small, grimy space, their mom serving as office receptionist. While Weinstein was the public face of the company, making acquisitions and bullying employees, Bob, his partner and best friend, remained quietly behind the scenes as the valued money cruncher.

The key to Weinstein's success, his annoying personality notwithstanding, was an ability to spot obscure but appealing films the major studios eschewed. From My Left Foot to Cinema Paradiso, Weinstein's picks were impeccable. Steven Soderbergh's Sex, Lies and Videotape was Miramax's breakout hit, grossing $54 million in world sales, winning the top prize at Cannes and spawning an indie boom.

The Crying Game, with six Oscar nominations, struck paydirt, too, but "a string of disasters" left Weinstein in financial jeopardy. Disney saved him, buying ownership of Miramax and giving him and Bob a lucrative contract and a free hand to produce and distribute their brand of movies.

After purchasing Sling Blade for $10 million and thereby unintentionally inflating the price of indie films, Weinstein achieved his greatest triumph as Quentin Taratino's Pulp Fiction became the first indie film to gross more than $100 million.

Still more triumphs lay ahead. The English Patient, his first big-budget film, won nine Oscars, while Good Will Hunting, which cost $20 million to make, grossed over $200 million. Amid these successes, Weinstein – who had a gift for buttering up actors – garnered notoriety by unilaterally recutting films and making hard-sell Oscar campaigning effective.

Avrich believes he lost focus by flirting with politics and launching Talk, a gossip magazine that lost $50 million and eventually closed.

At Disney, meanwhile, Weinstein's relationship with his boss, Michael Eisner, grew toxic in the face of budget overruns and controversial films such as Kids and Priest.

Chicago, a musical that grossed a whopping $300 million in global sales, provided a reprieve. In 2005, however, Disney severed its ties with Weinstein, who proceeded to form The Weinstein Company.

Having reinvented himself, Weinstein lost his magic touch. Many of his films bombed. "More misses than hits," the New York Times reported, noting his failure to deal with the challenge posed by new media.

Weinstein roared back with Inglorious Basterds, which globally grossed $313 million. But in 2010, Disney closed Miramax. Weinstein tried to buy it back, but Disney sold it for a cool $600 million-plus.

Despite the blows inflicted on him, Weinstein is far from finished, Avrich speculates. He will likely adapt to change and re-create himself.

True enough. His latest film, The King's Speech, has picked up 12 Academy Award nominations. Watch out for Harvey.

Singer Melissa Manchester views Judaism 'as a gift'

Marvin Glassman
Special to the CJN

Singer-songwriter Melissa Manchester has a career in show business that few can match.

She's written hit songs for herself as well as other artists and she's won a Grammy Award. Her career has included writing for theatre, film and television and acting. Currently, she's teaching a course on writing for a musical at University of California at Los Angeles.

Manchester, whose career in music has spanned 35-plus years, will perform with her band at Casino Rama on Feb. 12.

"I am looking forward to singing my hit songs, album cuts and songs from the musical theatre as well," said Manchester on the phone from her Los Angeles home.

Manchester's hit songs Don't Cry Out Loud, Midnight Blue, Through the Eyes of Love, Come In from the Rain and her Grammy Award-winning You Should Hear How She Talks About You have been standards on adult contemporary radio for the past three decades.

Less well-known is the influence Judaism has played in defining her life and career. Manchester's musical journey began as a child in Manhattan, listening to her cantor at B'nai Jeshurun Congregation chant the Shabbat prayers and sharing the blessings with her mother and sister at holiday meals and simchahs.

Ironically, her father, David, a bassonist with the Metropolitan Opera, was a confirmed atheist, but he never stopped his wife and children from participating in their synagogue. "My father and mother had their differences on Judaism, but it was positive for me as nobody was rebelling," Manchester said. "My cantor inspired me to what would become my calling in music. I view Judaism as a gift and very much needed to connect with my soul."

Manchester has found much happiness along with her fame. She's been married for 29 years to music consultant Kevin DeRemer and has two children (her daughter, Hannah, is a singer-songwriter as well).

Manchester, who's going to turn 60 soon, decided to reaffirm her faith by celebrating her bat mitzvah in 2005.

Melissa Manchester

"When I took some time off in the last decade to raise my children, I felt a spiritual longing to do my bat mitzvah as my children had done when they were 13. I feel a closeness now to Judaism that is stronger than I had as a child."

Manchester honed her musical skills with the many Jewish mentors in her life. After working in the music business as a teen, singing commercials and writing music, she took a songwriting course at New York University from singer-songwriter Paul Simon.

Manchester's big break came in 1971 when she performed in the clubs of Greenwich Village, catching the eye of Barry Manilow, then musical director for Bette Midler, who hired Manchester to sing backup with her. Within six months, Manchester had a recording contract and then a hit song with Midnight Blue. She went on to headline shows on her own tour.

During her long career, Manchester has been praised not only for her music but also for her acting skills. She played Maddie in the television series Blossom, starred with Midler in the film For the Boys and wrote and starred in the musicals Hats and I Sent a Letter to My Love.

"Melissa's success comes from her abilities to do so many things in show business. She is one of the very few singers who can move an audience with her powerful voice and piano alone," said Scott Benarde, who wrote a chapter on Manchester in his book Stars of David: Rock 'n' Roll's Jewish Stories. "The lyrics to her songs move the soul in a way that few singer-songwriters can."

Manchester is proud to have written her own Chanukah song recently, titled Let There Be More Light, which she hopes to record soon.

Dancer lands lead role in Royal Winnipeg Ballet show

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

The youngest dancer in Royal Winnipeg Ballet history to play Juliet in Romeo and Juliet is taking the stage again in another leading role – Nathalie in Moulin Rouge: The Ballet.

Maureya Leibowitz, now 20, was 18 when she played Juliet. She joined the company in 2007.

She's known since she was very young that dance was her passion. "I started creative movement when I lived in Malibu at the age of three, and then I started actual ballet when I was five, but I didn't start training professionally until I came to Winnipeg when I was 11," she said.

"Right when I came [to Winnipeg], I was surrounded by kids my age that wanted to [dance] as much as me, and had the focus and determination in the classes that I really enjoyed."

Maureya Leibowitz

Of the roles Leibowitz has played, which, in addition to Juliet and Nathalie include Wendy in Peter Pan and Clara in The Nutcracker, she said Juliet is her favourite.

"It was exciting," she said of finding out she would be playing Juliet. "Right away your first thought is, 'Let's start this process.' You don't think, 'Oh my goodness, you just picked me to play the role,' you accept and thank them. You're already on top of where do I begin to start learning the role, but more importantly, how I want my Juliet to be."

The feedback from critics and audience members for Leibowitz's portrayal of Juliet was overwhelmingly positive, which she said left her "appreciative and touched.

"Just that the audience was able to connect with me and go through the story with me, and I was able to convey what I was feeling to them, was amazing. I was so pleased that I touched people."

Leibowitz's work with the Royal Winnipeg Ballet has seen her do her fair share of travelling, including a visit to Israel in October 2010. In 1975, it was the first Canadian ballet company to perform in Israel.

This was not Leibowitz's first time in Israel – she went on a Birthright trip and extended her stay for two months – but being there with the company was an entirely different experience.

"It was so nice to return, because when I was there I had a great time on my vacation, I got to let loose and go to the beach, the markets," she said.

"I kept feeling that it would be so amazing to come [to Israel] on tour and be in the homeland with the people that I love around, but doing what I'm passionate about and dancing on the stages."

The Royal Winnipeg Ballet production of Moulin Rouge: The Ballet will be in Toronto from Feb. 10 to 12 at the Sony Centre for the Performing Arts. For more information and to purchase tickets, visit www.rwb.org.

The story behind the iconic Warsaw Ghetto photo

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

It is one of the most iconic photos of the Holocaust, even, perhaps of the whole war. A black-and-white photo of a young boy wearing a hat and a coat, his hands raised above his head in surrender. He is at the foreground of a group of people being led out of a bunker in the Warsaw Ghetto.

Who is the boy? Who is the young woman standing on his left looking back, perhaps at the SS man, his rifle in hands. Who is the little girl? What were the circumstances that led them to this moment in time?

Dan Porat, a professor at Hebrew University of Jerusalem, wondered all of this. After hearing rumours that the boy was alive and well, and now a doctor living in New York, Porat decided to research this photo and the people in it.

The result is The Boy: A Holocaust Story (Hill and Wang), which despite its misleading title is an engaging narrative about five people, three Nazis and two Jews whose lives intersected.

But many readers will be puzzled by what I consider to be the misleading title. To be fair, Porat points out in the prologue, this book does not identify the boy in the photograph. However, he says, it is beside the point.

"Is the lost life of the little boy more important than that of the little girl at the left-hand side of the photograph? Are the lives of this little boy and girl in the photograph more significant than those of children or adults outside the photo frame? The answer is simple and absolute: no."

Maybe not, but there's no doubt people will see this book with the iconic photo on the cover and, understandably, think this is about him.

It isn't.

Instead through meticulous research and interviews, Porat weaves a narrative history of the Warsaw Ghetto through the lives of five people.

• Josef Stroop, the supervisor of the Warsaw Ghetto's liquidation, whose report the author used as a major research source for the book. With the report, there were some 50 pictures, which included the original photo of the book's title.

• Franz Konrad, who as head of the ghetto's confiscation division was in charge of all items left behind by Warsaw's Jews transported to Warsaw. He became known as the Ghetto King. He took many of the photographs included with Stroop's report, quite possibly including this one.

• Josef Blosche, an SS soldier, is the only person definitively in the photograph. He's the SS soldier in the photograph, holding the gun behind the boy.

• If the woman at the boy's left in the photo lived to tell her tale, it would probably be similar to that of Rivkah Trapkovitz, narrated here – only with a tragic ending. Trapkovitz, a young Polish woman from Lodz, was captured and sent to the Warsaw Ghetto. A brave and courageous woman, she escaped from a train transport and managed to survive the war. She moved to Israel afterward.

• And finally, little Tsvi Nussbaum who was seven in 1942. Orphaned when the Gestapo killed his parents, he lived clandestinely with his aunt and uncle in "Aryan" Warsaw before he went to the Hotel Polski, where Jews who were hiding were gathered, believing they were going to be traded by the Nazis for German nationals abroad. It was all a ruse and Tsvi, along with the rest of the Hotel Polski Jews, were sent to Bergen-Belsen.

Tsvi survived the war and became an ear, throat and mouth specialist in New York. He became convinced that he was the boy in the photo and that the photo was in fact taken outside the Hotel Polski, not the Warsaw Ghetto. It is a highly unlikely scenario.

To his credit, Porat writes a good story. He admits to filling in descriptive gaps where necessary, but insists this is not historical fiction. The book also contains around 60 photographs, many of which were taken during the Ghetto's liquidation and included in Stroop's report.

So don't let the title fool you. This is a good book, a historical narrative of the Warsaw Ghetto, well worth reading, but don't expect this to be a story about the boy in the photograph.

Hitler often made the claim that his World War I experiences were the most formative of his life, but in truth what we know about his role in the war comes mostly from his exaggerated claims in Mein Kampf and from highly unreliable testimonies from cronies trying to curry favour during Hitler's rise to power.

There is very little contemporary material available of Pte. Hitler's time as a dispatch runner in the war, and historians know next to nothing of Hitler's supposed formative years.

Thomas Weber's Hitler's First War (Oxford) instead focuses on Hitler's regiment, RIR 16, also known as the List Regiment, and takes us through all the battles and experiences it had during the war in an attempt to reconstruct a fairly accurate image of Hitler from this time.

Hitler's First War is an extremely detailed but never tedious narrative of his Bavarian regiment's war role and debunks several of the "Hitler myths," including why he was awarded the Iron Cross and discusses the origin of Hitler's "stabbed-in-the-back" conspiracy (the idea that the German army did not lose World War I but was instead betrayed by its home country) and his antisemitism.

Fans of 20th-century history and specifically World War I will love this book.

Ex-Steeler Randy Grossman recalls glory days

Ron Kaplan
JTA

WHIPPANY, N.J. — For ex-Pittsburgh Steelers tight end Randy Grossman, being nicknamed "The Rabbi" was inevitable.

"The fellow who pretty much nicknamed everyone was Dwight White, who recently passed away," Grossman said of the outstanding lineman from the Steel Curtain defence of the 1970s. "He and I were locker neighbours and, yeah, what are you gonna call a white kid from Philadelphia who's Jewish? Sparky?"

"The Rabbi" would ascend the championship bimah four times in his eight years playing for the Steelers' dynasty. His four Super Bowl rings are the most of any Jewish player.

As his old club prepared to take on the Green Bay Packers in Super Bowl XLV in Dallas, Grossman reminisced about his time with the Steelers and talked about his Jewishness and the absence of antisemitism he encountered in his career.

Among his on-field memories is catching a short touchdown pass from Hall of Fame quarterback Terry Bradshaw in the 21-17 victory over the Cowboys in Super Bowl X 36 years ago.

"It's exciting, but one of the things I try to make people realize is that whatever level you're at when you're playing in a championship game – whether it's in high school or college or professionally – it is the most exciting thing that could happen," Grossman, 59, said in a telephone interview from his home in Pittsburgh. "Doing something great in high school wasn't any less exciting than doing something as a professional."

Grossman had come to the Steelers as an undrafted free agent following a stellar career at his hometown Temple University, where he made third-team All-America from the Associated Press.

"If you didn't get drafted, it was pretty much of a long shot," he said.

But the long shot stuck, and Grossman caught 119 passes in 118 regular season games for 1,514 yards – a 12.7 yard-per-reception average – and five touchdowns.

His four Super Bowl rings – won in 1974, '75, '78 and '79 – edge offensive lineman Harris Barton, who won three (1988, '89, and '94) playing for the San Francisco 49ers. Barton's teammate, John Frank, won two (1984, '88).

Other Jews who have the championship jewelry include Bobby Stein, the first Jewish player to appear in a Super Bowl (Kansas City Chiefs, 1970); the late Lyle Alzado (Oakland Raiders, 1983); Alan "Shlomo" Veingrad (Dallas Cowboys, 1992); and Josh Miller (New England Patriots, 2004).

Grossman, who has worked in the financial services industry for the past 21 years, said he opted for the Steelers because they had moved to the American Football Conference (AFC) following the merger of the National Football League and the American Football League (AFL).

As a receiver, he was excited by the pass-heavy offense of the AFC – the successor to the aerial circus of the AFL – rather than the grind-it-out rushing attack of the National Football Conference.

"The AFL was where all the throwing action was," he said. "My favourite teams were the Raiders and the Kansas City Chiefs and the San Diego Chargers, because they threw the ball."

Grossman said he can recall only one incident of antisemitism in his many levels of football, when a player on the field said something derogatory, "and as soon as he said it, from the look on his face, I think he realized how out of line he was."

Grossman shrugged off the comment.

"In sports, in my era and currently, it really is the great melting pot," he said. "If you 'bring game,' you're fine. If you're an imposter, then they'll run you out regardless of what your religious preferences are or ethnic background is.

"It was obviously different in the '60s, '50s, '40s, but from the time that I've been involved, it's been completely open and purely performance-based acceptance or non-acceptance."

He recalls Steeler teammate Steve Furness converting to Judaism. Grossman says he played no part in the process.

"His wife was Jewish, and that was the primary catalyst for his conversion, for his children," Grossman said.

Grossman, who was inducted into the Philadelphia Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in 1999, described himself as a "Manischewitz Jew."

"The rabbi at my bar mitzvah commented about me that I wasn't always inside [the synagogue]," he said, "but they always knew where to find me – outside playing football."

Unlike today's multimillionaire stars, Grossman played in an era when having an off-season job was a given.

"Once you were finished playing football, as [ex-Steelers head coach] Chuck Knoll used to say, you got on with your life's work," Grossman said.

"For a lot of us, our reputations as adults were started here, so a lot of people stayed here and found jobs, went into business, did what they did next."

As for this year's Super Bowl, which pitted his Steelers against the Green Bay Packers, Grossman said he wouldn't be jetting to Dallas for the game.

"There are two ways to see a game," he said. "Obviously one is to go, and you have to go to experience it. But to see it, you watch it on TV or video. So I'm gonna be kicked back and comfortable and watch it at home."

TU B'SHVAT ON ICE

Members of the middle school hockey team at Leo Baeck Day School's south campus, in Holy Blossom Temple, embraced the spirit of Tu b'Shvat by raising money for the Jewish National Fund. Though the team missed the school's Tu b'Shvat assembly to play a game, each player made a contribution from their own money that, coupled with principal Jonathan Harris' offer to sponsor a tree for every goal scored, raised a grand total of $600.

Vandalized shul in Montreal hosts digital hate preview

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Abraham Cooper

MONTREAL — It was no accident that the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) chose the Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue (TBDJ) last week to present a preview of its report on Canadian Digital Terrorism and Hate.

It was a logical decision, as SWC associate dean Rabbi Abraham Cooper told The CJN, since the TBDJ and several other local synagogues, a daycare and a school were recently attacked by a vandal who shattered windows at each location all in one night.

"That's why we chose here," he said.

At the press conference – also attended by retired Jean Brébeuf Parish priest Father John Walsh, TBDJ spiritual leader Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, Beth Israel Beth Aaron's Rabbi Reuben Poupko, Cote St. Luc (CSL) mayor Anthony Housefather, Hampstead mayor William Steinberg, and police Cmdr. Sylvain Bissonnette of Station 9 in CSL – Rabbi Cooper displayed several dozen web pages that pointed to a burgeoning use of social networking sites such as Facebook and Twitter to spread hate and pro-terrorist messages.

They included:

- A Facebook page called Kill-a-Jew;
- Numerous pages all over the world targeting not only Jews, but also, increasingly, Christians and Muslims;
- A Twitter feed depicting Adolf Hitler as a "Noble Wolf."

For Rabbi Cooper and the SWC, the situation in Canada is better, since freedom of speech here doesn't extend to disseminating hate, or as he put it, "crossing the line."

Still, he said, there have been noteworthy problems in Canada, such as a server based in Toronto that has carried a how-to site on making explosives.

"It's highly unusual to find this type of information on a Canadian server," Rabbi Cooper said. "We give Canada a high grade, but not a perfect one."

Other Canada-relevant pages and "chatter" have included praising (in Arabic) the recent Montreal vandalism as retribution against Israel, as well as praising the campaign to boycott the purchase of Israeli shoes at a local store.

Rabbi Cooper cited the notorious case of former University of Toronto student Salman Hossein, whose site Filthy Jewish Terrorists advocated the murder of Jews. Hossein is now believed to be living outside Canada, but he had no trouble finding a server in another country to host his site after his original one was shut down.

Rabbi Cooper, who also met with officials in Montreal and Ottawa to present advance copies of SWC's 13th interactive report on Digital Terrorism and Hate for 2011, noted that it's mostly young people, not adults, who are aware what's taking place on social networking sites.

"It is not more hate," Rabbi Cooper stressed, but "more exposure in the mainstream and social media. It's an incubator of hate, a multiplier, and provides empowerment."

Other participants referred to the recent Montreal vandalism as a sign that while antisemitism is not as prevalent as it was decades ago, it remains a problem.

"It still hurts," said Rabbi Steinmetz about the recent attacks. "It is critical to the health of a democracy that every member condemn every [antisemitic] event."

Rabbi Poupko said that while the attacks were disturbing to the community, historically the most serious attacks have been followed by "arrests and convictions."However, there have been no arrests made in connection with the Dec. 16 attacks.

'Important to provide opportunities for open political dialogue'

Abramowitz said he hopes that UJA Federation and CJC "will recognize those who are responsible [for the event] and not put a shadow on those who had no responsibility."

The Winchevsky Centre houses several organizations, including the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir and the Winchevsky School, which were not involved in organizing the event.

The school has, on occasion, received funding from the federation, and the choir has been part of wider community events, Abramowitz said.

He added that UJPO's membership is wide-ranging, including Zionists, non-Zionists, and "believers who are in various other synagogues, but who belong for cultural reasons… There are very few places where there is Yiddish culture."

According to the Winchevsky Centre's website, its institutions are "guided by a celebration of secular Jewishness and Yiddishkeit, anti-racism and social justice principles, a respect for other cultures and a progressive outlook on world issues."

English told The CJN that "criticism of Israel is perfectly legitimate, but when an individual goes beyond criticism of Israel to suggest or explicitly say that Israel should be eliminated, or when an organization provides a platform for an individual to say that, we will not be associated with that individual nor the organization."

Rudner said that the two organizations first contacted the Winchevsky Centre when they learned of the program in early January.

In a Jan. 19 letter, Hermolin wrote to Goodman, Spiro and Bialystok, "The Winchevsky Centre is aware of the range of political views on the issue of Israel-Palestine. As a progressive venue, we feel it is important to provide opportunities for open political dialogue."

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Jake and Amir – 'easily digestible, hopefully funny'

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

One says he's the "king of Canada," a world traveller and finds former Los Angeles Lakers player Rick Fox attractive. The other enjoys Annie's Macaroni and Cheese, takes his water very seriously and prefers actor Leonardo DiCaprio to Rick Fox..

The self-proclaimed king of Canada is 28-year-old Amir Blumenfeld, who, along with 25-year-old Jake Hurwitz, is best known for the popular Jake and Amir web series on the website CollegeHumor.com. In the series, Jake typically plays the role of the strait-laced guy annoyed by Amir's antics, while Amir just wants to be Jake's friend.

The two were in Toronto recently for a sold-out show at the Isabel Bader Theatre, their first time touring in Canada.

"[It's] Jake's first time [in Canada]," Amir said. "I've been plenty of times. I'm sort of like a world traveller. I've been to various states, like Texas. Have I been to Toronto [before now]? No.

"We flew by it," he continued, when asked if he and Jake went sightseeing. "Went to our hotel, showered and now we're here. But it's been beautiful."

"The nicest Holiday Inn Express you've ever seen," Jake added.

Zach Liknaitzky, 20, a third-year York University student and Hillel social chair, organized the event, "What the Hillel?" He wanted to bring Jake and Amir, who are New Yorkers, to Toronto because of their popularity, and also to bring the Jewish community together.

"I realized... that Jake and Amir had a really strong, Jewish presence because they both are Jewish. So I thought to myself, 'Why don't we try to bring them in?'

"I thought this would be good for Hillel because I want to be publicizing to both young Jews and the entire Jewish community," he continued. "I feel like there aren't enough times where Jews come together for good things, and I thought this would be a good example of that."

Liknaitzky got in touch with Jessica Agi, a producer and tour manager from CollegeHumor, to work on bringing Jake and Amir to Toronto. "[Jessica] said they had been looking for a good reason to come to Canada," Liknaitzky said.

When asked why it took them so long to do a show in Canada, Amir said, "The real question is, why did it take so long to get invited to Canada? Did you do anything about us not coming to Canada?

"The whole country's filled with people who just didn't invite us, until this guy right here," he continued, pointing to Liknaitzky. "First invite, [we] snatched it up."

The show, which Jake and Amir hosted, featured appearances by comedy troupes Statutory Jape, PB&J and Smells Like The 80s.

In an interview before the show, Jake and Amir displayed much of the humour and back and forth banter that has made their videos famous.

"It's because they're funny, short, you feel like you can watch one, then watch another," Jake said, discussing why he thinks Jake and Amir is so popular.

"They're easily digestible," Amir added. "And hopefully relatable. And hopefully funny. But not everyone thinks they're funny."

"Some people don't think they're relatable, either," Jake said.

"Some people are like 'This is not funny. This is stupid.'" Amir said. "But like, I'd say 99 per cent of people on Earth have never seen our videos."

As for how they produce Jake and Amir, Jake said it's a combination of improvisation and script.

"The way we write is sort of like improv. We'll come up with an idea, sit in a room and we'll go through a whole scene without writing anything down. Then we'll realize, 'Oh, that's the episode right there. Write down everything we just said!' When we're shooting, the script is... kind of the bones of our idea."

"We have a phrase around the office, 'script is king.'" Amir interjected. "You just made that up," Jake said, laughing. "That is the first time I've heard anyone say that."

Amir, who was born in Israel, said that Judaism is "a part of my life. We practise it. We celebrate Jewish holidays."

"Less so for me," Jake said. "I'm interfaith. My dad is Jewish and my mom's Christian. I was raised Jewish and [had a bar mitzvah], but I'm not really practising anymore. Not like this guy," he added, pointing to Amir.

"Practice makes perfect," Amir said. "Practice is king," Jake responded. "That's like a phrase in our office," Amir shot back.

They also talked about some of their recent projects, including a not-yet-released video with Rick Fox and Amir's role in the movie A Very Harold and Kumar Christmas.

"It was great," Amir said of working with Fox. "I'm a huge Laker fan, so it was awesome. He's very funny and very attractive."

"Before Rick Fox came, Amir was asking me which celebrity I'd be the most nervous to do something for, and I think it'd be anybody in comedy," Jake said.

"That's not true," Amir interrupted. "You said Leonardo DiCaprio."

"Leonardo DiCaprio's better looking than Rick Fox," Jake replied.

As for working on Harold and Kumar, Amir said it was "fun, but also boring during stretches.

"Acting is very boring. I don't even know if I like it. It was fun to be there and see everything happen... but for like 12 hours a day, I'd be in my trailer. Which sounds luxurious, but it's actually like an abandoned trailer park, and that was before I even got to the set."

"That was before you got the movie," Jake joked. "It's just where you live."

As for their relationship, Amir calls it "difficult" – partially because of Jake's hydration needs.

"Like 20 minutes ago, Jake was berating me – like screaming at me at the top of his lungs in the car – because I forgot... water for him or something small like that."

"See, I could describe the same story and it's tough because everywhere we go, Amir forgets water. How are you supposed to live without water?" Jake asked.

"To answer your question truthfully," Amir added, "we're buddies."

As for how he defines success, it comes down to doing what you like and hopefully being good at it.

"I can want to be a model and I can try to be a model, but I would never be a model," Amir said. "I have very Semitic features, and like that wouldn't play well in photographs."

"הילדים עוד פעם מנדנדים שהם רוצים לנסוע לישראל הקיץ." נאנחת דלית, חברתי, כשאנו יושבות בבית הקפה השכונתי, וטוחנות שלל עוגיות סינטטיות. "איך אני מתגעגעת לימים, בהם האומציות של ביצת קינדר או טיול לישראל היו שוות ערך..." היא מוסיפה. אני מהנהנת בהירהור. חשבתי שאצלי המצב קל יותר. הילדים שלי עוד קטנים. דלית נמצאת כאן כבר 14 שנה (פז"מניקית רצינית מבחינתי), הילדים שלה בני נוער שכמעט נולדו כאן, ועדיין... כשאני חוזרת הביתה מצוברחת, מאיר מייד מוריד את השקית של הריסייקל לגרז', כשהוא רואה שזה לא עוזר (פלוס רחיצת כלים מתנשפת, והכנת ארוחה קלילה), הוא מניח שהוא לא אשם בכלום הפעם, ומתיישב לנוח. "זה הכל באשמתך!" אני מדיעה לו ומתיישבת ממולו. "אם לא היו לך שבעה אחים חמודים כל כך בישראל, שמפנקים את הילדים שלך וקונים להם שטויות בטונות כסף, ולוקחים אותם לבילויים לילייים ופותחים להם שולחנות מפוארים ומשפחתיים, ומטיילים בנגב עם טיולי ג'יפים, הכל היה יופי!".

וככה אנו מתרוצצים מבוהלים ומיוסרים. אחרי הכל אשמנו ופשענו. הרי לקחנו נשמות טהורות ומיקמנו אותן בקור ובבדידות, בלי משפחה ובלי טלוויזיה ראויה. "תעשי לי טובה אמא, לא יעזור לך כלום. אנחנו נוסעים שוב בקיץ!" מדיעה לי הקטנה התנשאות בתום היום. ומגחכת בסלחנות, כשאני מושיטה לה ביד רועדת חבילת ביצי קינדר מתוקה...

The police: a need for change

Most Jews, when asked about the efficiency and fairness of the Toronto police, will say they are satisfied with how our 5,600-member force is managed and its overall character. That would be a reasonable statement since the vast majority of us have only seen a police badge when stopped while speeding or at the Walk for Israel.

Here's the problem.

If you were to wade into the world outside of the Bathurst Street corridor, you would discover that the Toronto Police Force is regarded by many individuals as an institution that is heavy-handed, utilizes excessive force, and is over-budgeted and racist.

John Sewell, a former mayor of Toronto and a critic of the force, has just written a book called The Police in Canada: the Real Story, in which he states: "The characteristics of police culture can be summed up this way: it encourages robust solidarity with other officers; it is isolated from other parts of society; it assumes importance for protecting social values as understood by police; it believes others do not have a real understanding of police work."

Sewell deduces from this that there is little accountability within the force and that officers often act outside of the normal parameters of our city's institutions. A good example is the recent city budget, in which the police asked for a three per cent increase in funding (plus eventual wage increases), while a request from city staff to all institutions asked for a five per cent cut. (See Sewell's website at www.thepolicefile.ca). There were few questions asked.

Urban Writer

The G20 introduced many of us to the force in a new way. We witnessed unprovoked beatings and police brutality on our nightly television broadcasts. A class action suit (www.g20classaction.ca) has been launched to determine how 1,000 people were detained without good cause, many of whom were simply walking home from work. Sherry Good, who is acting as the representative plaintiff, was detained for hours in a downpour without food or access to a toilet.

"The biggest consequence was that I lost all trust in police," Good said. "Now I am nervous when I see a police car. I consistently look over my shoulder."

The G20 was an embarrassment to Toronto. Our police force made sure of that.

Over the years, I have heard many stories about the police and their heavy-handed nature. A fellow shul-goer told me she was instructed by a police officer to perjure herself in court. An Israeli man I know was apprehended by the police, who beat him badly and broke his ribs, after he had attempted to get payment from a client for work done. The man did not report the incident.

Native Canadian colleagues, formerly homeless, told me how police would often drive a native man or woman down to Cherry Beach, dump him or her out of the cruiser and then beat him or her up. The police would leave them on the shore, with few clothes, to find their way to warmth.

O'Brien Christophers. Jeffrey Reodica. Byron Debassige.

Read about these men. Each was killed by a police officer. One had serious psychiatric difficulties. One was shot in the back. Officers are often charged after such shootings but rarely found guilty despite overwhelming evidence showing otherwise.

Be vigilant of our police force. Read updates by the Toronto Police Accountability Coalition www.tpac.ca. We need to trust our police. As Jews, we know what it is like when we can't.

Abbas orders resignation of cabinet to prevent Palestinian unrest

Palestinians in Ramallah on the weekend demonstrated their approval of the deposing of Hosni Mubarak in Egypt. In response to the events in Egypt, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas announced several initiatives to try to cement the stability of his own regime. Please see the editorial on page 8.

RAMALLAH, West Bank — The Palestinian Authority cabinet resigned Monday in an apparent attempt by President Mahmoud Abbas to demonstrate political reform in the wake of the popular uprising in Egypt.

The shakeup could bolster Abbas' image among Palestinians dissatisfied with the workings of a cabinet regarded by many as dysfunctional.

The reshuffle had been demanded by Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, who has spearheaded efforts to create institutions needed for a Palestinian state. Fayyad will retain his post and select new ministers, officials said.

"The cabinet resigned today and the formation of a new cabinet will take place as soon as possible," Ali Jarbawi, minister of planning, told Reuters.

Financed by international donors and engaged in co-ordinating security with Israel, the Palestinian Authority has a limited mandate in the West Bank. It lost control of the Gaza Strip to Hamas Islamists in a 2007 civil war.

Abbas' credibility has been further sapped by stalled talks with Israel on a deal to establish a Palestinian state.

Hamas, which rejects permanent coexistence with Israel, said in response to the reshuffle that it was motivated by Abbas' fears that Palestinians would follow the lead of Egyptians in demonstrating for political change.

"Unless Mahmoud Abbas carries out serious security and political reforms, his authority will be subject to the wrath of the Palestinian people," Hamas spokesperson Sami Abu Zuhri said in the Gaza Strip.

Although several anti-Abbas protests erupted in the West Bank after the upheaval began in Egypt on Jan. 25, he has not faced large-scale demonstrations in the territory, whose economy has strengthened in recent years.

However, Abbas has faced public criticism over the functioning of the government. Of the 24 posts in the outgoing administration, only 16 were staffed. Two ministers resigned and six are marooned in Gaza.

Abbas said the new cabinet should focus on "strengthening the preparedness of the national institutions for the establishment of the state of independent Palestine," according to the official Palestinian news agency, WAFA.

The Palestinian Authority announced Saturday that it would call legislative and presidential elections by September. The last elections were held in 2006.

Hamas said it would not take part in the ballot or recognize the results.

Cotler Honoured

JERUSALEM — Montreal MP Irwin Cotler was honoured by the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists with a lifetime honorary membership for his work on Jewish and Israel-related issues. The former Canadian justice minister received the honour at the group's 14th annual congress, which ended Feb. 5 after being held at the Dead Sea and in Jerusalem.

WORLD

Neo-Nazi Moved

STOCKHOLM — A Swedish neo-Nazi leader who organized the theft of the "Arbeit Macht Frei" sign from Auschwitz was transferred to Sweden to serve his three-year jail sentence. Anders Hogstrom was handed over to Swedish officials Feb. 7 at Krakow Airport. A Polish court last December sentenced Hogstrom, who acted as a middleman between a neo-Nazi buyer and five Polish thieves, to 32 months in prison as part of a plea bargain. Hogstrom faced up to 10 years in prison. The iron sign, which measures 16 feet across and means "Work makes you free," was stolen from the former Nazi concentration camp in December 2009 and found 72 hours later, cut into three pieces. Hogstrom was arrested in February 2010 in Stockholm and extradited to Poland.

Release Sought

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Dan Quayle urged U.S. President Barack Obama to release spy-for-Israel Jonathan Pollard. Quayle, U.S. vice-president from 1989 to 1993, is the highest ranking former official to call for the release of Pollard, the civilian U.S. Navy analyst who was sentenced to life in 1987. Quayle's Jan. 31 letter is also significant because it adds to the growing list of former Republican officials seeking Pollard's release, including George Schultz, secretary of state when he was arrested. Congressional Republicans have resisted joining a recent call by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) to release Pollard, who's said to be ill.

Jew Named To Court

RIO DE JANEIRO — Brazil's highest court will have its first Jewish member. Judge Luiz Fux, 57, was approved Feb. 9 by the country's Senate to be seated on the Supreme Federal Court, an 11-member panel that decides constitutional and other matters, as well as final appeals. Fux is now a judge of the Superior Court of Justice and presided recently over a commission that forged Brazil's new Civil Process Code. He's also a writer and professor. In 2009, Fux received the Theodor Herzl Trophy, given by the Rio Jewish Federation and the Israeli Embassy to distinguished Jews.

Drop Charges: Profs

LOS ANGELES — Dozens of faculty at the University of California, Irvine, have asked that criminal charges be dropped against 11 Muslim students who disrupted a speech by Israel's U.S. ambassador last February. Some 100 faculty members signed a letter asking the Orange County District Attorney's Office to drop the charges filed this month against nine Irvine students and two students from the University of California, Riverside. Arraignment is set for March 11 in Santa Ana, Calif. The letter notes that while the students, led by the Muslim Student Union, were wrong to disrupt the speech, they were already disciplined by the university. During the Feb. 8, 2010, speech by Michael Oren, the 11 students stood one by one and shouted at him, calling him a "mass murderer" and a "war criminal," among other insults. The disruptions, to protest Israeli actions in Gaza, prompted Oren to walk off the stage twice. Many Jewish groups have praised the charges.

Giffords Speaks

HOUSTON — Gabrielle Giffords spoke for the first time since she was shot. C.J. Karamargin, a spokesperson for the Arizona Democrat told CNN Feb. 9 that she had asked for toast. Giffords is in a recovery facility in Houston. She was shot in the head on Jan. 8 as she met with constituents in Tucson, Ariz. Six people were killed in the attack, including one of her aides. Giffords, 40, is the first Jewish congresswoman from Arizona. She was born to a Jewish father in a Reform home.

Zorba the Antisemite?

ATHENS —Greek composer Mikis Theodorakis says that he's an "antisemite and anti-Zionist."

Mikis Theodorakis

Theodorakis, who composed the music for the film Zorba the Greek, also told Greek TV's High channel that "everything that happens today in the world has to do with the Zionists." The 86-year-old composer added that "American Jews are behind the world economic crisis that has hit Greece also."

A local hero, Theodorakis was, and is, involved in politics. He has been a member of the Greek Communist party for the last 60 years. Although once a supporter of Israel, he gradually became its biggest critic in Greece, later going from criticizing Israel to making antisemitic remarks and holding antisemitic positions.

In 2003, he declared that "Jews are at the root of all evil." When the Greek Jewish community reacted strongly to his statement he apologized, but nothing really changed.

Strangely, during the television interview, Theodorakis said, "I'm an antisemite but I love Jews."

Theodorakis criticized Greek Prime Minister George Papandreou for meeting with his Israeli counterpart Benjamin Netanyahu. According to the composer, Netanyahu is a persona non-grata in Greece due to his "war crimes in Lebanon and Gaza."

History of Bergen-Belsen DP babies chronicled

Jakob and Cyla Spiewak with Kresia (Karen) in 1946 in front of the Bergen-Belsen block where they lived.

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

After placing an ad in The Canadian Jewish News about five years ago, Paulette Volgyesi met and immediately bonded with two strangers.

Volgyesi, Karen Lasky and Isaac Applebaum were all born a few months apart at Glyn Hughes Hospital in Bergen Hohne, located five kilometres from the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp.

Named after the first Allied medical officer to enter Bergen-Belsen, the hospital was part of a displaced persons' camp established in Germany by British forces for refugees after World War II. With about 11,000 residents in 1946, it was the only exclusively Jewish camp in the British zone of Germany.

Between 1946 and 1950, when the camp was disbanded, about 2,000 babies were born in the hospital.

Lasky said her daughter told her about The CJN ad, and she went to see Volgyesi armed with family photo albums. "We immediate felt the connection. It was a unique place to be born," said Lasky.

She said that when they compared photographs, they realized the surroundings were all the same, only the people were different.

The three have begun researching the whereabouts of other Bergen-Belsen babies living in the Greater Toronto Area – so far, they have found 28 – and are interviewing them about the impact of being born at Bergen-Belsen.

Babies born there symbolized new life for their parents who had already suffered so many losses, Volgyesi said. "The three of us are anxious to find out about the babies circumstances at birth, and how it affected their lives. We'd like to know what impact it had on their life choices.

"One way or another, everyone at Bergen-Belsen became family. They met their partners, and they had babies. They were all clinging to life."

Unfair commentary

The current civic unrest and political upheaval in the Arab world is to this generation of journalists and experts what the days of glasnost and perestroika in eastern Europe were to journalists and experts more than two decades ago.

The news is at its most exciting.

Deeply meaningful, potentially epochal events are unfolding day by day, to the surprise of most observers, and with relatively little bloodshed. As so many have written, we are indeed, witnessing "ordinary" people steering the course of history.

It is the imperative of journalists and experts to try to make sense of these important events: understand them, explain them, anticipate their implications and, if reasonable, look to the future. We accept or reject the experts' commentaries according to the fair presentation of facts, the soundness of reasoning, as well as, of course, our own predispositions and preferences.

From the editor's desk...

I might add that no one is better at pointing to and pointing out shoddy or shining commentaries than Paul Michaels, the communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee. One commentary on the events in Egypt, however, that Michaels will not have had time to write about was that of Jeffrey Simpson in the Globe and Mail last Saturday.

The headline of the commentary asks: "Why did Ottawa drag its feet on Mubarak?" The sub-heading expands upon the headline: "The Harper government remained hesitant, cautious and, frankly, on the wrong side of history."

In most of the article, Simpson purports to explain the intricacies of the current roiling state of affairs in Egypt. But the biting thrust of his analysis is to sharply condemn the Harper government's responses to the turn of remarkable events in Egypt.

As the headline and sub-headline make plain, Simpson cavilled at the fact that the federal government's support of the forces seeking change in Egypt was too slow, "so hesitant, cautious."

And why was it "so hesitant [and] cautious?" according to Simpson.

"The Harper government, once again, [is] seeing the Middle East through the exclusive prism of Israel's interest... Better the dictatorship we know than the democracy we don't seemed to be the Israel and Canadian position."

Simpson has mischaracterized the Israeli response to the events in Egypt. That is not surprising, though it is grating. For it hardly lies in the mouth of Jeffrey Simpson to judge the appropriateness of the Israeli response to a situation that can be described quite modestly as having far-reaching, grave implications for the Jewish state. But set that aside.

His gratuitous tying together of the two countries' responses is certainly unfair to Canadian foreign policy. And among those who harbour malevolence in their hearts toward Israel, it will trigger sneering, mischievous echoes of history's often heard vituperation: "blame the Jews."

This column is not intended to defend the federal government's response to events. Though, to my mind, it was reasoned, cautious-as-required and supportive-as-required. The column is intended, rather, to point out how unfair and unwarranted, Simpson's glib asperities were.

On Feb. 2, Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon said the following concerning the events in Egypt (excerpted): "Our government continues to stand by the people of Egypt as they demand democratic reforms and respect for human rights. We urge the government of Egypt to begin an immediate transition toward serious democratic reform." (My emphasis)

One day later, on Feb. 3, British Prime Minister David Cameron issued a joint statement on behalf of the U.K., France, Germany, Italy and Spain concerning events in Egypt (excerpted): "Only a quick and orderly transition to a broad-based government will make it possible to overcome the challenges Egypt is now facing. That transition process must start now."

Any fair comparison of the two statements shows that they essentially say the same thing. And yet, would anyone on earth accuse these European countries of "seeing the Middle East through the exclusive prism of Israel's interest"?

After Hosni Mubarak stepped down, Prime Minister Stephen Harper said (excerpted): "Our government encourages all parties to move forward with a peaceful, meaningful, credible and orderly democratic reform process toward new leadership, including free and fair elections, in order to build a brighter future for the people of Egypt.

"Canada will continue to support Egypt in implementing meaningful democratic and economic reforms. We will also continue to encourage and support Egypt's efforts to promote regional stability and peace, including with Israel, as well as continued respect for peace treaties in the Middle East." (My emphasis)

The government's policies should be judged on their merits. It is too bad Simpson did not do that. MBD

'Useful idiots' backing blockade slammed

Mavi Marmara had no cargo, says academic

By Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Jonathan Fine is happy to discuss the unfolding events in Egypt and Iran's attempts to impose a fundamentalist Shiite "arc" across the Middle East.

Jonathan Fine

As an academic adviser in the international program in government, diplomacy, and strategy at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, he's got his finger on the pulse of a seething region. There are the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, to discuss, the danger that Pakistan's nuclear weapons will fall into Islamist hands, Iran's growing influence, the uncertainty over Turkey and, of course, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But it's the Mavi Marmara that really stirs him up. The Mavi Marmara, of course, was the Turkish ship that was part of a "peace flotilla" intercepted by Israeli commandoes last May. Nine Turks were killed after they attacked Israeli commandoes boarding the ship to enforce a blockade of Gaza.

What really gets Fine going is how the media treated the incident – their acceptance that the flotilla had anything to do with peace and that Israels was to blame for the deaths of nine Turkish "jihadis."

The whole incident was a set-up, a sham, a bluff, he declared during a visit to Toronto, where he met with specialists interested in international security issues. The IHH, the organization responsible for placing the Islamic fundamentalists on board, hoped to create a provocation. They provided the jihadis with small arms and knives, they lied in saying the ship was carrying humanitarian supplies – it actually had no cargo – and they encouraged the attack on Israeli troops, he said.

The first two Israelis to board the ship from a helicopter – students of his in Herzliya – were shot in the leg and shoulder. The jihadis then tossed their pistols overboard, he said.

The Israelis reacted as any commando unit would in a similar situation. "They went into full combat operations," he said.

Besides the media's naivete when reporting the event, Fine was also contemptuous of the "useful idiots" who accompanied the ship and who ignored the jihad-supporting history of the IHH.

Fine, who was in Toronto and Ottawa as part of a visit that also saw him travel to Washington, D.C., said he constantly runs into supporters of groups such as the IHH and Hamas on campuses in the United States. They are generally uninformed about the people they're supporting, he said.

Fine estimated that 75 of the more than 500 people on board the Mavi Marmara were jihadi activists. Jihadis boarded the ship in Istanbul after being briefed by the Turkish security service and being equipped with ceramic bullet-proof vests, gas masks and small arms.

Still others were "vicious activists who think Israel is the major problem in the Middle East and who have no qualms if Israel were to disappear."

Most of the rest on board were "useful idiots" – a term first used to describe western supporters of the Soviet cause – who were otherwise "good-hearted people" but who "don't know who is using them and what they're being used for."

Fine, who specializes in analyzing political and religious violence, has met and debated many young idealists on American campuses and found "a lot of kids are ignorant. They don't know what they're talking about."

What's more, they're hypocritical, he continued. Activist groups pretend they have "a global conscience, but they were silent in August 2008 when Russia used cluster bombs to attack Georgian civilians. No one demonstrated against the Russians at all."

And, he asked, where was the world when the Sinhalese government of Sri Lanka killed thousands of Tamils?

Canadians are preparing to assist additional ships that will try to break Israel's blockade of Gaza, he said. But what have the Gazans achieved under Hamas? "They got sharia. They're turning into an Iranian satellite. What future do the people of Gaza have?"

As for Egypt, Fine said he had no crystal ball, but he worried about what would happen if the army and intelligence services abandon President Hosni Mubarak.

"The question is, who steps in?" he asked. "Egypt has no civil society. Egypt has no experience with democracy. The problem is, if you get rid of dictator A, what do you get instead? A pro-West dictator or the Muslim Brotherhood."

If it's the latter, "that would be destabilizing. Not only would it hurt Israel, but it would spell the total collapse of U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East," he said.

Israel overflowing with social entrepreneurs

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

A group of young Israelis recently came to Toronto to discuss social entrepreneurship.

The panel discussion, called "Innovation Israel: Shaping Israel's Future. Today," was sponsored by Nefesh B'Nefesh, which helps people make aliyah, and PresenTense, a group that enables young Jewish people to take their ideas and make them reality.

Speaking at the event, which was held at The House on Feb. 9, were Romi Shamai, Elyssa Moss Rabinowitz and Chaim Landau. Sharon Millendorf, who works at Nefesh B'Nefesh, moderated the discussion. Shamai, Moss Rabinowitz and Landau participated in the PresenTense fellowship program in 2009.

Social entrepreneurship, Millendorf said, is forming a "venture" to solve a problem. It is similar to a business, but while businesses measure success on profit, social entrepreneurs consider their ventures successful if they are able to bring about change.

Israel, Millendorf continued, is overflowing with social entrepreneurs.

Shamai is the founder of Baabua Gigantic Bubbles and Peula.

Baabua Gigantic Bubbles, a business Shamai started in 2009, makes soap bubbles large enough to fit a person inside. Shamai takes Baabua to events – birthday parties, bar and bat mitzvahs, and other events – across Israel.

People with business ideas urged to run with it

Shamai, who was born in Jerusalem, began working on a social entrepreneur venture, Peula, a few months after starting Baabua. On Peula.net (peula means "action" in Hebrew) people can publish correspondence with organizations on the website, allowing others to follow it. When the organization sees that many people are following the correspondence, it encourages the company to take action on the issue, Shamai said. The website went live at the beginning of the month.

"[Peula] gives power to the citizen, because instead of just writing your own letter and getting a polite response... and nothing happens, suddenly many people are part of the correspondence and waiting for a reply," he said.

Shamai also said that people with business ideas should take the idea and run with it.

"If you have an idea that you want to pursue, the main thing is... to commit to your idea and start working on it. That will be the thing that will bring you results."

Moss Rabinowitz was born in California and made aliyah with her parents when she was eight. She is the co-founder of Kol HaOt: Illuminating Jewish Life Through Art. The company's goal is to use the arts to convey the meaning of Jewish texts and ideas, history and values.

While enrolled at Bar Ilan University, Moss Rabinowitz studied Jewish text and Talmud, which she continued doing after graduating.

"The more I learned, the more I felt how much I didn't know," she said. "I felt a disconnect between people who had the opportunities and access to study Jewish texts and the rest of the Jewish world, which doesn't always have the same accessibility."

As a result, she started A Day Away, a production company that created events with Jewish content. She did this for 12 years before realizing that she wasn't satisfied with her one-night events because they didn't reach a wide enough audience. That's why Moss Rabinowitz, with three partners, to found Kol HaOt .

For two years, Kol HaOt has offered workshops that use the arts to share Jewish ideas with groups of North Americans travelling in Israel. Kol HaOt's next phase is to open a centre in Jerusalem with a beit midrash and a gallery for exhibits. At night, it will become a Jewish cabaret-type space, with drama, music, dance and comedy performances.

Landau made aliyah after he finished high school. He studied political science at Bar Ilan University, served in the Israel Defence Forces and got a master's degree in international relations at the London School of Economics. Then he enrolled at the Pardes Institute in Jerusalem, a non-denominational yeshiva.

At Pardes, he found that many of the students, most of whom were from North America, would stay for one year, had limited opportunities to get out of the "English-speaking bubble" and had ambivalent attitudes toward the Arab-Israeli conflict. There were opportunities to hear Palestinian perspectives on the conflict, but not so much to hear the Israeli side, he said.

Landau started Perspectives Israel, a program for Diaspora students studying in Israel that gives them two-day trips in which they are exposed to a wide range of Jewish-Israeli perspectives on the conflict.

"[I] realized that we had to offer a program that speaks the language of these students – a young audience of political thinkers that don't want to be told who to believe, what to believe, but are looking for the exposure to many different viewpoints," he said. The first tour was held in March 2010. Landau also works for Shatil, an organization that each year, helps nearly 1,400 non-profit organizations with consulting and training.

Trying to pre-empt the PA domino's fall

Hosni Mubarak never quite seemed to understand who was in Tahrir Square and on the streets of his country, what they wanted or what was truly happening there. Truth be told, he was not the only one, especially at the beginning. But unlike most everyone else who was surprised by the initial outbreak of the demonstrations and their strengthening, ongoing resolve, even at the end, he did not catch on. He was in denial even as he boarded the helicopter to Sharm el Sheikh. Ultimately, Mubarak left his palace because he lost the support of the army.

He never had the support of the streets.

The breeze blowing through the Middle East is likely a gathering of the solemn sighs of cold fear from other Arab strongmen and potentates who rule their respective peoples by right of might rather than by right of the ballot. The mostly languishing, unemployed or underemployed younger generation demands to be heard – now. Last weekend they shouted and marched their way onto the streets of Algeria and of Yemen. Any country in the Middle East where the drab realities of daily life are at infuriating odds with the more dazzling possibilities suggested by the modern world of e-mail and iPhones could be next.

Thus it was that the current leadership of the Palestinian Authority (PA) took steps on the weekend to immunize themselves against the claim that their regime, too, is illegitimate.

First, President Mahmoud Abbas announced that there would be both presidential and legislative elections by September of this year. A date was not set for the vote. No doubt the pace of events unfolding in other Middle East countries will affect the haste by which Abbas chooses a date for the election. Hamas denounced Abbas' decision. "We will not confer legitimacy to these elections, nor will we recognize their results," said Hamas' Gaza spokesperson, Fawzi Barhoum. It would appear that the radical Islamist rulers are feeling a bit nervous about the extent of the love they are feeling from their fellow Gazans.

Next, Abbas announced that he had asked his prime minister, Salam Fayyad, to demand the resignations of the entire cabinet. The move would enable Fayyad to appoint a new cadre of ministers who, presumably, would be more demonstrably capable and responsive to the needs and demands of the people.

Then, Abbas' chief negotiator, Saeb Erekat, resigned his post in an effort to abate the anger many Palestinians felt toward him for having purportedly offered too much to Israel during negotiations in 2008. Taken together, these measures are Mahmoud Abbas' see-through attempt to pre-empt his own domino from falling. Time will tell if his people like what they see when they look through the transparent veil of the PA's expediency.

Akiva Lewinsky, treasurer of the Jewish Agency, said his organization should be prepared for large-scale immigration from distressed Jewish communities worldwide. His comments came after Soviet Refusenik Anatoly Sharansky arrived in Israel following his release, and about a year after 10,000 Jews were airlifted to Israel from Ethiopia.

Speaker doesn't represent Winchevsky

The article "UJA, CJC sever ties with Winchevsky Centre" (Feb. 10) dismayed me. I am a lifelong member of the organization, as were my parents. I have been, and will continue to be critical of some of the policies of the Israeli government, but I will never advocate for Israel's annihilation.

In "Canadian Jews urged to speak on Israeli issues" (Jan. 27), it is stated that "Anat Hoffman has a message for Canadian Jews: Israel is 'too important to be left to Israelis. The Jews here have a right and a duty to voice their hopes for Israel.' If they don't, she warned, 'they may wake up one day and see an Israel they absolutely cannot relate to... Israel is a state of all the Jews, whether they live there or not, and reflects on all Jews.'"

When speaker Hajo Meyer expressed his hopes at a Winchevsky Centre event, it was his own opinion. He does not speak for me nor for many of the members of the United Jewish People's Order, which was indicated by the low turnout of members of the organization at the event.

The action of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress to disassociate themselves from the Winchevsky Centre brings up a moral issue. Should the entire organization and its 85-year history be punished for the words of one person who is not even a member? Should Sodom and Gomorrah have been destroyed for the actions of a few citizens? Abraham was able to negotiate with God on this issue. I certainly hope that federation and the CJC are serious about leaving the door open for discussion.

Centre's speaker was 'refreshing'

I must say that Winchevsky Centre guest speaker Hajo Meyer's talk was refreshing, as was the centre's courage in putting it on ("UJA, CJC sever ties with Winchevsky Centre," Feb. 10). What isn't refreshing, and for that matter, rather stale, is UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's and the Canadian Jewish Congress' bullying. They don't speak for this Jew.

The number of days Hamas has held Gilad Schalit captive

CJC's expulsion of community group

The article "UJA, CJC sever ties with Winchevsky Centre" (Feb. 10) makes reference to the Canadian Jewish Congress' expulsion of United Jewish People's Order (UJPO) in the 1950s due to allegations that it was Communist and under the control of the Soviets. More specifically, the catalyst for CJC expelling UJPO was its campaign against (West) German rearmament.

While this was indeed in line with Soviet objectives, the real problem for CJC was that UJPO's campaign had resonance throughout the Jewish community, as no Jewish person in his or her right mind was at ease with the idea of rearming Germany less than a decade after the fall of Hitler (nor did a lot of non-Jews feel comfortable with the idea).

Of course, in the climate of the Cold War, the West wanted West Germany in NATO as part of its front line against the Eastern Bloc, and the CJC, obligingly, thought it was more important to align itself with the Canadian political and military establishment and show its loyalty to it than to represent actual Jewish public opinion, so out went UJPO, which, at the time, was actually the largest affiliate within the CJC.

West Bank settlements

Sheldon Kirshner's Feb. 3 column, "West Bank settlements affect peace talks," on the obstacle to peace posed by the festering settlement issue was a breath of fresh air in a conversation so frequently dominated by putting all the blame on the "other." Yes, the other side is often hateful, obstinate and dangerous, but that does not give us licence to ignore our own actions that exacerbate the problem. Yes, we can quote international law and divine revelation to justify the settlements, but when not a single country supports continued settlement expansion, isn't it time to examine the political, human and material cost that is being expended?

Muslim Brotherhood seeks to subvert democracy

Jonathan D. Halevi

Just before President Hosni Mubarak resigned and handed power to the Egyptian military, the United States was reportedly backing a transitional government that would include members from a broad range of opposition groups, including the Muslim Brotherhood.

The Muslim Brotherhood, a global movement with Hamas as its Palestinian branch, had taken a greater role in organizing the protest against the Egyptian regime as it unfolded its independent political agenda, defying both the American administration and Israel. Rashad al-Bayumi, the Muslim Brotherhood's second-in-command, announced in an interview with Japanese TV that the group would join a transitional government in order to cancel the peace treaty between Egypt and Israel, as it "offends the Arabs' dignity and destroys the interests of Egypt and other Arab states." He further explained that his animosity to the American administration stems from its support for Israel, stressing that Egypt does not need American aid.

The Muslim Brotherhood does indeed participate in political activity and defend the democratic process. That is not, however, because it has accepted the principles of western democracy, but rather because the democratic process can be exploited to establish an Islamic regime that will then render democracy unnecessary, as was made evident by its platform in the 2007 Egyptian parliamentary elections. The organization claimed to be participating in the elections because "the Muslim Brotherhood preaches the path of Allah... [and therefore it is participating] to fulfil Allah's commands in peaceful ways, using existing constitutional institutions and a decision determined by the ballot box." That is, democracy is Islam's entryway to power.

The Muslim Brotherhood platform also noted that "the rule in [Egypt] must be republican, parliamentary, constitutional and democratic in accordance with the Islamic sharia," and that "the sharia ensures liberty for all." The organization does not accept the principle of the separation of church and state, and the Islamic rule they aspire to is, for them, a realization of democracy.

Interviewed on Sept. 17, 2007, by the Egyptian daily newspaper Al-Karama, the Muslim Brotherhood's then-Supreme Guide Muhammad Mahdi Akef said that the organization's campaign slogan would be "Sharia is the Solution" and that human rights and democracy would be included under sharia rule. He devoted his May 12, 2007, weekly missive to an exposition of democracy as seen through Muslim Brotherhood eyes. He said that only Islam, which was given to men by Allah, was the expression of true democracy.

He wrote that "Islam preceded... doctrines and ideologies devised by men. The final, absolute message from heaven contains all the values which the secular world claims to have invented... Islam and its values antedated the West by founding true democracy, exemplified by the Shura [the advisory council under the caliphs] and Islam's respect for the equality of other religions... With regard to liberty, Islam reached a goal which secular preachers have not, for the liberty promised by Islam is genuine in every way, even in faith and religion... As to the claim that Islam does not recognize civil authority, the authority of Islam is democratic... it is genuine liberty, it provides equality in practice and is transparent, it neither oppresses nor robs any man of his rights... It is on that foundation and with those values that the Muslim Brotherhood calls for justice, equality, and liberty.

Akef has never equivocated regarding his views on western democracy. On April 30, 2005, he told the Egyptian daily newspaper Al-Ahram that the Muslim Brotherhood opposed American democracy because it was "corrupt and serves the American agenda... The Muslim Brotherhood has held demonstrations against foreign intervention and against any democracy that serves the Americans... [American] democracy is corrupt because it wants to destroy the [Islamic] nation, its faith and tradition." He told the BBC that western democracy was "unrealistic" and "false."

One of Akef's examples of America's "corrupt values" is the attempt to stop female circumcision in Africa. On July 12, 2007, he wrote that "[the Americans] spend billions of dollars and endlessly plot to change the Muslim way of life, they wage war on Muslim leaders, the traditions of its faith and its ideas. They even wage war against female circumcision, a practice current in 36 countries, which has been prevalent since the time of the Pharaohs."

According to the Muslim Brotherhood, jihad, that is, holy war against the infidels, is one of the fundamental elements spread by the Muslim Brotherhood. The organization's ideology, as it appears on its official website, regards "the Prophet Muhammad as its leader and ruler, and jihad as its path." Jihad has a global strategy beyond self-defence. It is the unceasing attack on every infidel rule, intended to widen the borders of the Islamic state until all mankind lives under the Islamic flag.

Clicking the links "The Goals of the Muslim Brotherhood" and "Muslim Brotherhood Measures" leads to explanations of jihad based on the writings of Muslim Brotherhood founder Hassan al-Banna. Jihad, it is noted, is Islam's most important tool in effecting a gradual takeover, beginning with the Muslim countries, moving on to re-establishing the caliphate over three continents in preparation for a conquest of the West, and finally instituting a global Islamic state.

The organization's website states: "We want a Muslim individual, a Muslim home, a Muslim people, a Muslim government and state that will lead the Islamic countries and bring into the fold the Muslim diaspora and the lands robbed from Islam and will then bear the standard of jihad and the call to Allah. [Then the] world will happily accept the precepts of Islam... The problems of conquering the world will only end when the flag of Islam waves and jihad has been proclaimed.

"The goal is to establish one Islamic state of united Islamic countries, one nation under one leadership whose mission will be to reinforce adherence to the law of Allah... and the strengthening of the Islamic presence in the world arena... The goal... is the establishment of a world Islamic state. And if prayer is a pillar of the faith, then jihad is its summit... and death in the path of Allah is the summit of aspiration."

The Muslim Brotherhood does not hide its global aspirations and the violent path it intends to follow to achieve them. The Brotherhood is meticulous in its step-by-step plan, first to take over the soul of the individual and then the family, people, nation and union of Islamic nations, until the global Islamic state has been realized. The principle of stages dictates the Muslim Brotherhood's supposed "moderation." However, that "moderation" will gradually vanish as Muslim Brotherhood achievements increase and its acceptance of the existing situation is replaced by a strict, orthodox Muslim rule whose foreign policy is based on jihad.

For the Muslim Brotherhood, jihad is at the centre of the struggle against the United States, the West, Israel and other infidel regimes. The supreme leader of the Muslim Brotherhood regards Islam as waging "a battle of values and identity" against the forces of "imperialism" and the "Anglo-Saxons" attacking the Arab-Muslim world "on the pretext of spreading democracy, defending minority rights, and opposing what they call terrorism." He advises Muslims to adopt "the culture of resistance against the invasion," explaining that Allah gave "the occupied, oppressed nations jihad and resistance as a means of achieving freedom."

He added that "the culture of resistance to invasion and occupation have intellectual, military, and economic aspects. Experience in Palestine, Iraq, and Afghanistan have proved that resistance is not imaginary or fictitious or impossible, but rather it is possible when the [Islamic] nation presents a united front and uses its weapons and faith to face an imperialist, whether he comes with arms or inundates us with his ideas, values, or obsolete morality." Akef's successor, Mohammad Badi', maintains the same platform.

Lt.-Col. (ret.) Jonathan D. Halevi is a senior researcher of the Middle East and radical Islam at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. He is a co-founder of the Orient Research Group Ltd. and is a former adviser to the policy planning division of the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Merging the old, the new and the spiritual

They are charming, (mostly) religious and (mostly) single. They are the characters on Srugim, the enormously popular Israeli television program, soon to enter its third season. Srugim, or crocheted, refers to the crocheted kippot favoured by the modern Orthodox. The dramatic series focuses on 20- and 30-something modern Orthodox singles (and, in season 2, a newly married couple) in Jerusalem.

By all accounts, the series is popular with both religious and secular viewers. Secular viewers tune in because of a fascination with religious society, finding a window onto a way of life that seems mysterious. The show also highlights their similarities with modern religious Israelis. In that sense, Srugim feels both exotic and familiar, foreign yet homey. For religious viewers, it offers a chance to see the fabric of their lives portrayed sympathetically and in a popular venue.

The intersecting story arcs deal with love, commitment, intimacy, career and sexual identity – issues also faced by secular Jews, but complicated by the religious context. For example, a married couple's "infertility" (after only a few months of marriage) turns out to be a matter of ill-timed ovulation, which occurs precisely when the laws of niddah, or family purity, forbid intimacy. At the same time, the couple's stressful encounter with medicalized reproductive technology – roller-coaster emotions, self-doubt, distance – isn't unique to religious couples.

In many ways, the series bridges the gap between the secular and the (modern) religious, demystifying religious life and making its issues more familiar and resonant with secular viewers. As such, it works against the forces of polarization and social fragmentation in Israel.

Similarly, in North America, the sharp divide between different kinds of Jews and denominations has become more porous. One illustration of this is the renewed place of ritual immersion in the life of liberal Jews. Until recently, the mikvah, or ritual bath, was a fixture of Orthodox communities, but largely irrelevant to liberal Judaism, except for conversions. For Orthodox Jews, the mikvah is most closely linked to women and marital intimacy, but men, too, make use of the ritual bath – to inaugurate new dishes, and to immerse before Yom Kippur, before Shabbat and before marriage. Rabbi Shimon Huberband, who chronicled life in the Wasaw Ghetto, movingly described men defying Nazi law to immerse in a mikvah.

In Israel, the rabbinate requires that brides submit proof of ritual immersion before marrying. Resented by many secular women, this regulation has generated a sub-rosa industry of falsified mikvah certificates. But here in North America, liberal Judaism has increasingly embraced the powerful spiritual potential in ritual immersion. It's increasingly common for brides – at their own initiative – to immerse before their wedding. Liberal mikvaot have sprung up – initially, often, to meet the needs for non-Orthodox conversions. But once available, members of liberal communities use them for myriad functions. In some cities, a grassroots desire galvanizes a community to demand mikvaot.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Across denominations, Jews have renewed the practice of immersion, developing rituals of rebirth and renewal – for example, recovery from trauma, such as rape or abuse; marking a shift in status, such as after a period of mourning or after divorce, and emotional healing, such as after miscarriage or serious illness.

Some might interpret this as part of a general swing to the right, to tradition, or, conversely, as a liberal dilution or (mis)appropriation of religious practice. Either view fails to recognize the rediscovery by liberal Jews of a pool of potential in traditional practice that can imbue life with spiritual resonance. It's not so much a rejection of the secular for the religious, but an understanding that the boundaries between the two may be more porous than we usually think.

The second season of Srugim begins and ends with episodes that feature tvillah – ritual immersion – in living waters. In the first, a groom prepares for his wedding. In the final episode, he readies himself to tackle the problems eating at the young marriage. In connecting immersion to his personal life, the program shows how tradition finds new resonances in modernity.

The embrace and reinvention of tradition evokes the words of the first chief rabbi of the Yishuv, HaRav Avraham Yitzchak HaCohen Kook: "Hayashan yitchadesh, v'hechadash yitkadesh" – the old shall be made new, and the new shall be made holy.

Soldiers at the Wall

The only reasons that take me to the Western Wall in Jerusalem are visitors to the city and the occasional bar or bat mitzvah, which, despite reservations about the venue, I attend in order to honour friends. Unlike some Jews who insist that the place inspires them to devotion, it doesn't move me to prayer. Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel taught that Judaism doesn't have holy places, only holy events. Moreover, those who abuse the Wall – e.g., by restricting women – in the guise of piety should be shunned, for religious reasons.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

But I made an exception one evening last month when my grandson was being sworn in at an Israel Defence Forces ceremony there. As a new conscript, he pledged his allegiance to his country and received a gun, which we pray he'll never have to use, and a Tanach, which we hope will inspire and guide him in the course of his service and beyond.

On one level, the ceremony was corny. It consisted of several standard patriotic speeches with many references to Scripture, especially to Joshua's conquest of the land. The very fact of holding the event at the Wall is also problematic, for it gives the impression of turning military necessity into a religious imperative. Had I chosen the texts, they'd come from the Prophets urging us to divine service and national self-scrutiny.

But the speakers did make some reference to the pursuit of peace and to what Israelis call "the purity of arms." Despite the military drill, the recruits weren't being primed to become indiscriminate killers but, rather, thoughtful and proud defenders of their people. This was no nationalist rally, but a sombre moment reflecting the realities of life in Israel.

Though we were spared the usual clichés about the Holocaust, my wife and I couldn't help but think of it. As children, we witnessed the Shoah, she in the ghetto of Lodz and the concentration camp of Ravensbruck, I at a somewhat safer distance in various parts of the Soviet Union. We well remember what it was like when Jews weren't able to defend themselves. The only reason why they'd be brought to parade grounds was to be selected for extermination.

As critical as I am of many aspects of the politics of the current government of Israel, I also know that had there been no Jewish state, our people might by now be on its way to becoming quaint exhibits in museums. Even though I believe that this government has been elected foolishly, I know that it was done freely and democratically, and that that's unique to this part of the world.

To have grandchildren who are partners in shaping and maintaining Jewish sovereignty fills me with pride and gratitude. Their parents have imbued them with a sense of love for the country and taught them their duty to treat all human beings, including adversaries, as God's creatures. As critical champions of democracy, they're loyal Israelis who espouse at times unpopular causes for peace, justice and coexistence.

It's a balance that's difficult to keep, and few of us get it right. We tend to veer either to too much particularism with insufficient regard for others, especially the minorities in Israel itself, or to too much universalism, which sometimes may obscure a commitment to our own. Trying to root ourselves in tradition, we select from it to suit our prejudices.

Jews in the Diaspora, perhaps because they're on the sidelines, are prone to be attracted to extremes. Many blindly toe party lines and mouth slogans that deliberately distort the opposite point of view. As exciting as it is to feel a part of Israel, it's very easy to get the situation wrong from whatever angle you try to assess it, even if it's in an ostensible effort to support the Jewish state and to find your own role in its defence.

Most of the civilians present at the ceremony were parents and relatives. Tourists from abroad, especially non-Jews, who might have found themselves there at the time might be forgiven for being repulsed by the seeming militarism. But if they know at least something about Jews and their history, they might reflect on the alternatives and ask themselves if they would have accepted for themselves the threat of their own extinction just for the sake of being considered by the rest of the world to be good guys and noble victims.

Mubarak struck a balance on Israel

Protesters in Cairo's Tahrir Square demanding President Hosni Mubarak's removal and a new epoch of democracy in Egypt held aloft a sea of signs condemning his authoritarian regime. Some of the placards were emblazoned with a photograph of Mubarak's face crossed out by a blue Star of David, leaving the menacing impression that, as a Zionist stooge, he had betrayed Egypt by having preserved Egypt's peace treaty with Israel.

The truth is more complex. Mubarak – who shared Israel's fear of Islamic fundamentalism, the Hamas regime in the Gaza Strip and Iran's quest to build a nuclear arsenal – honoured the 1979 treaty because it converged with Egypt's national interests. Thanks to the treaty, signed by his predecessor, Anwar Sadat, Egypt was able to end its futile and highly expensive era of wars and skirmishes with Israel and to cultivate mutually beneficial relations with the United States and the West.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Since Egyptian public opinion is essentially anti-Israel, due in part to the unresolved Palestinian question, Mubarak took pains to finely calibrate Egypt's bilateral relations with Israel. He catered to this sentiment by maintaining a cold, even frigid, peace with Israel.

Although he sold natural gas and oil to Israel, tolerated a measure of two-way trade, welcomed Israeli tourists and invited Israeli agricultural experts to help Egyptian farmers increase crop yield, he drew the line at conducting joint military exercises with Israel.

Mubarak stifled any real normalization. Egyptians were discouraged from visiting Israel. No cultural agreements saw the light of day. Professional associations boycotted Israel. (Last year, two top Egyptian newspaper editors who had dealings with Israelis were reprimanded). State and private media demonized Israel and Jews. And in an almost comical sign of the paranoic atmosphere that still prevails in Egypt, the governor of South Sinai had the gall to blame the Mossad for a shark attack on a German tourist in Sharm El Sheikh.

Efforts by Israel to warm up the cold peace failed miserably. And when tensions in the Middle East reached the boiling point, inflaming Egyptian public opinion, Mubarak twice recalled Egypt's ambassador in Tel Aviv, first in 1982 over Israel's passive role in the Sabra and Shatila massacre in Beirut during its invasion of Lebanon, and then in 2000 in response to the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising.

Mubarak, who was hounded out of office on Feb. 11, had testy relations with several Israeli prime ministers. He blasted Menachem Begin-the co-signer of the peace treaty – for invading Lebanon, building settlements in the West Bank and Gaza and letting the Palestinian problem fester. He declared that the Arab-Israeli conflict could not be defused as long as Yitzhak Shamir remained in office. He said that Benjamin Netanyahu, during his first term as premier, made him "very, very, very exasperated."

Mubarak, the former commander of the Egyptian air force, was friendlier with Yitzhak Rabin, a fellow general. The only time Mubarak – the former vice-president – visited Israel in his capacity as president was in 1995, when he delivered a brief eulogy at Rabin's funeral on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem, calling Rabin "a courageous" and "fallen hero of peace."

Mubarak also got along fairly well with Shimon Peres, whom he respected as an elder statesmen, and with Ariel Sharon, whom he believed was "capable of making peace."

At the end of the day, Mubarak was a prickly but valued ally. Though he lambasted Israeli policies, he kept faith with the peace treaty, which neutralized Egypt as a military adversary, served as an extremely important bridge to the Arab world and enabled Israel to cut its swollen defence budget and concentrate its forces on three flashpoints: Lebanon, Gaza and Syria.

"Mubarak deserves thanks for his tremendous efforts... to prevent wars and bloodshed and promote stability in the region," observed Peres, Israel's current president, in a recent assessment.

Acutely aware of Egypt's importance to its overall security, Israel expressed angst when mass protests erupted in Egypt on Jan. 25. Fearing that Egypt might descend into chaos, Netanyahu not only urged Egypt to abide by the treaty, but let several hundred Egyptian troops into a demilitarized portion of the Sinai Peninsula for the first time in three decades.

By the same token, Israel's foreign ministry called on western governments to tone down criticism of Mubarak. This was an ironic development, given Israel's promotion of democracy in the Middle East and given Egypt's decision, in 2009, to shun Israel's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman.

Israel's pro-Mubarak advocacy, though jarring to Egyptian ears, was rooted in the unromantic percepts of Realpolitik.

Mubarak, wary of the spread of Hamas-style Islamic influence into Egypt, played a vital role in enforcing the blockade of Gaza. Egyptian forces destroyed smuggling tunnels leading into Gaza, notwithstanding Israeli complaints that Egyptian measures were too lax. The Egyptians began building a wall along the border with Gaza, seized arms and munitions bound for Gaza, warned Hamas that continued rocket fire from Gaza could touch off another war, and arrested Muslim extremists planning attacks on Israeli tourists.

Prior to the 2008-09 war in Gaza, an Egyptian envoy, Omar Suleiman, whom Mubarak appointed vice-president on the eve of his forced resignation, tried in vain to renew Israel's shaky ceasefire with Hamas and to gain the release of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

In addition, Mubarak worked to nurture Arab-Israeli coexistence.

He broadly supported the Oslo process in the 1990s, the Camp David summit in 2000, the Arab peace initiative in 2002 and 2007, the "road map" peace plan in 2003, the Annapolis talks in 2007 and 2008 and, most recently, U.S. attempts to restart Israel's on-again, off-again negotiations with the Palestinian Authority.

Shortly after he was re-elected Israel's prime minister in 1992, Yitzhak Rabin met Hosni Mubarak in Cairo. [IPPA photo]

Yet he could be searingly critical of Israel. Mubarak blamed Israel for the breakdown of the most recent negotiations. He demanded a cessation of Israeli settlement construction in the West Bank, and he wondered why Netanyahu sought Palestinian recognition of Israel as a Jewish state. And always, he condemned Israel's occupation of the territories. At his last meeting with Netanyahu, Mubarak advised him to re-examine his policies so as to engender trust with the Palestinians.

Egypt's foreign ministry took a harder line on Israel, castigating Israeli air strikes in Gaza this past December as a ploy "to divert attention from the failure of the peace process." Meanwhile, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Gheit described Israel as an "enemy state." No surprise there. According to WikiLeaks, the Egyptian army continues to regard Israel as its chief adversary.

Egypt was also at odds with Israel over its undeclared nuclear program and its covert policy of assassinating Palestinian terrorists. Nonetheless, Egypt held fast to its peace treaty with Israel.

Egypt's ambassador to Israel, Yasser Reda, put it best. "President Mubarak," he said last April, "always asserted that peace is in Egypt's strategic interest."

Vaughan mayor stresses kinship with Jews

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The new mayor of the city of Vaughan, Maurizio Bevilacqua, says he has "deep roots" in the Jewish community.

In a sit-down interview at his mayoral office last week, Bevilacqua told The CJN that his commitment to "servant leadership" means he aims to provide his constituents with the best possible quality of life while taking into account all of their various cultural viewpoints.

He said his leadership style is such that it's rooted in knowledge of the people he represents. And a great deal of that knowledge is taken up by Judaica.

As the former Liberal member of Parliament for Vaughan – he served from 2004 to 2010 before leaving his seat to run for mayor last year – he said he is very familiar with his city's Jewish community.

"I often say to people who are going through personal challenges that a single ray of light can erase darkness," Bevilacqua said, alluding to the symbolism he notes whenever he contemplates the meaning of Chanukah.

Bevilacqua visited Israel in the mid-1990s and said he plans to return.

"I am aware of the community's history, its struggles and the great contribution they have made to the world in many areas of endeavour," he said, adding: "While it is important to remember the unfortunate incidences of history, it's also important to celebrate the achievement of a people who could have easily chosen the road to [capitulation], but rather chose the path of resiliency. And the world has benefited as a result."

Bevilacqua also referred extensively to one of his favourite authors, Viktor Frankl, the Holocaust survivor and psychiatrist who pioneered logotherapy.

"[Frankl] was able to live through the Holocaust and from that experience, develop a branch of psychotherapy that has helped millions of people," he said. "Where did that come from? An experience where the human condition was severely tested. It speaks to humanity's [and the Jewish Peoples'] ability to be resilient."

Bevilacqua said he believes the political environment at all three levels of government – municipal, provincial and federal – is still "playing catch-up" with the multicultural reality of the Canadian population.

"What I find extremely fascinating about the city of Vaughan is that we speak over 70 languages. But with that comes different cultural biases, different dispositions… yet we coexist in harmony. This speaks to the enlightened form of citizenry in Vaughan," Bevilacqua said.

He said as the new mayor, he intends to lead by example. One of his first acts was to pass the "Vaughan Accord."

The document, signed by the mayor and all Vaughan city councillors on Jan. 11; 2011, calls upon the city's elected officials to, among other things, "inspire cultural growth by promoting sports, the arts, music, theatre and architectural excellence; promote unity through diversity as a characteristic of Vaughan citizenship and ensure that our behaviour is at all times consistent with the city's core values of respect, accountability and dedication."

It's the first time council has signed such a protocol, Bevilacqua said.

"My goal is to establish a new era of mutual respect and co-operation – this document puts the promise of a productive council in writing. This is a fresh start for our city. This is how great cities are built, and this is how we are going to take Vaughan to the next level," he said in a speech at the signing of the accord.

He said as a public servant, he is motivated by a "higher purpose" to realize the full potential of his city.

With specific regard to Thornhill's burgeoning Jewish and Israeli immigrant community – represented by Ward 5 Coun. Alan Shefman – Bevilacqua said that he understands their experience and that he will work with Shefman to address the needs of the Jewish community going forward.

Speaking to the subject of newcomers to Canada and to his city specifically, Bevilacqua recalled how at age 10, he immigrated to Canada from Italy with his family in search of a better life.

Through hard work, persistence and determination he learned English and eventually became one of the youngest MPs in Canadian history.

"I've felt and lived [the hardships] of the immigrant experience in a very real way," he said, adding that he hopes his successes in Canada are viewed as an inspiration to newcomers.

Israeli family feels at home in Thornhill

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

When Gill and Neta Pasternak and their six children made the decision to move from Kibbutz Ortal in the Golan Heights to Thornhill, Ont., they prepared themselves for a culture shock.

"We thought we were leaving the kibbutz and were about to move to a big city," Gill Pasternak said.

"Now we understand that we moved from a very small kibbutz to a very big one... Our real estate agent is Israeli, customers and employees speak Hebrew in many supermarkets around us. We can speak Hebrew in the bank and find here any Israeli product we need," he explained.

"As Jews and Israelis we see ourselves as a part of the Israeli community and the Jewish community," Gill added.

While many Israelis make the decision to leave Israel to try to build a life somewhere else in the world, few have the courage to do it with six kids, each with different needs.

But the Pasternaks felt they were up for the adventure. "We felt it was the perfect timing for a refreshing change in our lives," Pasternak said. "After considering New Zealand, India and Canada as options for relocation, Canada seemed to be the best option – and here we are."

They first fell in love with Canada in 2009 during a month-long trip to the East Coast, and felt that a big change would be wonderful for their family.

"Once the decision was made, it took us about a year to prepare ourselves logistically and emotionally for the big move," he said.

When the couple and their six kids – Nof, 16; Peleg, 13; Gur, 9; Reches, 8; Sela, 4, and Arad, 2-1/2 – moved here last October, they stayed in a hotel for three weeks before they found a permanent home. Their four-bedroom house in Thornhill may seem small for a family of eight, but it's an upgrade from the space they called home on the kibbutz.

"Our house there was very small and six of our kids had to share the same room. Now the feeling is much more spacious," Pasternak said.

Finding a spacious house was not the only issue the Pasternaks had to deal with in their first days in Canada.

"Peleg, our second son, broke his leg while ice-skating at the very beginning of our arrival. We hope that the concept 'break a leg' will have a different meaning for us in the future," he joked.

After seeking some guidance from the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, the family worked to get settled. "We needed a vehicle for eight, a table for eight and actually everything for eight. We shipped most of our belongings in a container from Israel. The rest we purchased here, and now we are fine and organized," he said.

Now the number 1 priority for the family is to provide the children with a good education. "It is not easy to change the environment for six boys. And choosing the best education for them was and is our first goal. Our elder son, Nof, is in high school, our second son, Peleg, is in a public school, Gur and Reches are studying at the Associated Hebrew [Schools]. Sela and Arad are in day cares. Lots of manoeuvring during the day," he said.

Neta and Gill, who are currently in Canada on a study permit, also have to focus on getting permanent resident status so they can pursue employment in their fields. Gill, who worked as a quality assurance director in Israel, will begin a course in green business management in March, in hopes of finding a job that will combine his experience and new education.

Neta worked as a social worker and hopes to use her skills to the benefit of the Jewish community here.

"Toronto has the largest Jewish community in Canada. As an experienced social worker, I will be able to contribute to the community and hopefully find a job that suits my skills and experience," Neta said.

The Pasternaks are currently living on their savings until they can find work.

"Before coming here, we knew that Canada is an expensive place to live, and we prepared ourselves financially for the first six months."

With so much to do, they said it's rare if they're able to wind down for the night before 3 a.m., and by 7a.m., they're on their feet to do it all over again.

"Our living room is like a big playground. We don't have time to watch TV, and I don't even remember when the last time we heard the news," he said.

"But as long as we feel that our boys are happy and we see true smiles on their faces, everything is fine with us."

Future Sinai puts fun into fundraising

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Young professionals gathered Feb. 5 for a not-so-typical Saturday night of games for a good cause.

To celebrate the launch of Future Sinai, people aged 20 to 30 partied and played at eZone, an Etobicoke entertainment complex with activities such as laser tag, whirlyball and cosmic bowling.

Following the success of the Sinai Soiree in May 2010, Future Sinai was developed to advance, promote and fundraising for the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary among a younger generation of philanthropists. With the motto that "it's never too early to give back," Future Sinai will support the Auxiliary's $4.5-million women's health pledge.

'It's never too early to give back'

This funding ensures that state-of-the-art health care is provided in various Mount Sinai Hospital departments, including the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute and the Peter A. Silverman Centre for International Health.

"Future Sinai is the perfect avenue for young professionals to get involved in their community," said Lauren Winberg, who sits on the advisory committee.

"By getting involved in our 20s, we can develop the skills and build the relationships necessary to become community leaders and lifelong benefactors of Mount Sinai."

Winberg said the committee chose eZone as the party venue because they wanted to do something different that people would be excited about.

"Many young professional charity events are at bars or clubs, and we wanted our launch event to be more casual and enjoyable. We also wanted to do something that people are not usually given the opportunity to do on a Saturday night."

The party featured a live DJ, two bars, a lounge area with pool tables and an arcade, as well as access to golf simulators and the Rock Band video game. Those who signed up to be Future Sinai members also had a chance to win prizes such as Toronto Maple Leafs tickets.

For more information about Future Sinai and upcoming events, visit http://www.mountsinai.on.ca/auxiliary/future-sinai.

Hadassah Academic College finds a niche

Provides vocational education

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

There are 30 regional colleges and seven research universities in Israel, all of them doing fine and exemplary work, but Hadassah Academic College has carved out what is perhaps a unique niche for itself.

Providing vocational education for a mix of Jewish, Arab, secular and religious students from all parts of the country, it's Israel's only college in the heart of western Jerusalem.

Housed in a historic building, the site of the original Hadassah Hospital, it sits on the edge of Mea Shearim, Jerusalem's insular haredi neighbourhood, and is close to Zion Square.

Shimon Arbel

"We play a strategic role in revitalizing downtown Jerusalem and in strengthening Jerusalem as Israel's capital," Shimon Arbel, the Canadian-born director of institutional advancement, said in a recent interview.

Arbel, a native of Hamilton who made aliyah shortly before the 1973 Yom Kippur War and has lived in Jerusalem ever since, compared it to Ryerson University in Toronto.

"We're a career-oriented institution," he said.

With an enrolment of 2,200 students, 15 per cent of whom are Muslim and Christian Arabs and five per cent of whom are haredim, Hadassah Academic College offers programs in computer science, health and life sciences, design and communication, management and pre-academic studies.

It was established by the Hadassah women's organization in 1970 and funded by it until three years ago.

Arbel, formerly the Toronto-based national executive vice-president of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, was here on a fundraising mission.

"We're looking for philanthropic support," said Arbel, who met Jewish community leaders while in Toronto.

Half of the college's annual budget is provided by the Israeli government. Tuition fees account for one-third of its budget, while the rest, 20 per cent, comes from external donations.

Arbel's trip to Toronto marks the first time the college is soliciting donors in Canada. Until now, it relied on philanthropists in the United States.

But Israelis are also pitching in, he noted. "There is great wealth in Israel today, and Israelis are increasingly generous."

He describes Hadassah Academic College as a national rather than a regional institution of higher learning.

"More than 50 per cent of our students come from outside Jerusalem," said Arbel, whose cousin was the late Canadian novelist Mordecai Richler and whose name was Steven Albert before making aliyah.

Many of its students are from underprivileged backgrounds and at least 80 per cent are the first members of their family to attend college, said Arbel, whose Toronto-born wife, Josie, is deputy director of the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel.

The college also churns out candidates for Jerusalem's thriving biotechnology industry, offers Hebrew-language instruction programs for Palestinian Arabs from eastern Jerusalem and provides special programs for haredim.

Haredi men study computer science, while haredi women take courses in communication disorders and medical and laboratory science.

As well, the college offers pre-university courses in Hebrew and modern Israel to new immigrants.

About half the students go on to study at post-graduate schools, mainly the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Technion in Haifa.

Over 90 per cent of graduates find jobs within six months. "We're not producing unemployed lawyers," said Arbel, who holds a BA and an MA from Hebrew U.

The college plans to offer several new courses – an MA degree in computer science in the field of medicine, an MA in communications and politics and a BA in human resources.

The vast majority of its professors, 80 per cent, teach at other colleges or universities. Twenty per cent of its faculty members are employed on a full time basis by the college itself.

Due to its role in buttressing Israel's claim to Jerusalem, Hadassah Academic College hasn't been hit by government cutbacks to education.

"If we didn't exist, the inner core of the city would be in trouble," said Arbel. "We bring young people into Jerusalem."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:
"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The mezuzah, Part 1

"We gently and consciously enter the sacred space of our homes sh'ma v'ahavta, loving and listening, placing a kiss full of our loving intentions upon that little box, called a mezuzah, on the doorpost."
– Rabbi Goldie Milgram [http://bit.ly/mezuz01]

It is one of the most obvious signs of a Jewish home – an ornate box on the doorpost containing the mezuzah parchment. If you're in the middle of some home improvements, now is the ideal time to look at a spiritual fixer upper – your mezuzah.

The commandment for the mezuzah is in Deuteronomy: "And thou shalt write them upon the doorposts of thy house and upon thy gates." [http://bit.ly/mezuz02] The Judaism 101 site says that "the mezuzah is not, as some suppose, a good-luck charm, nor does it have any connection with the lamb's blood placed on the doorposts in Egypt. Rather, it is a constant reminder of God's presence and God's commandments." [http://bit.ly/mezuz03]

The mezuzah must be handwritten by a sofer, a trained scribe, onto parchment made from a kosher animal. If you have any doubts about your mezuzah, a sofer should be consulted. Although the mezuzah's text is far shorter than what is found in the Torah, the laws are complex. A mezuzah is made up of 22 lines and 713 letters, and 4,649 laws govern its writing. Just one error disqualifies it. [http://bit.ly/mezuz04]

Stories are legion about people who have purchased a mezuzah that is riddled with mistakes. And sometimes the mistakes are not innocent. Mezuzot printed on paper rather than written on parchment are sold to unsuspecting consumers. Sometimes scribes take shortcuts that drastically cut the time needed to write a mezuzah, which results in inferior products. The Israel-based Vaad Mishmereth STaM was established to "promote the halachic integrity of scribal arts" by certifying reliable sofrim. [http://bit.ly/mezuz15]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

MezuzaDoctor.org adds these sobering statistics: "After examining over 40,000 mezuzot, we found 16 per cent to be invalid, and of all of those that were found to be invalid, 93 per cent were never acceptable in the first place." [http://bit.ly/mezuz16] Rabbi Aaron Shaffier uses an interesting web tactic to warn people looking for cheap (and worthless) mezuzot. Anyone searching for the phrase "free printable mezuzah scroll" in Google is delivered to a page that explains there is no such thing. [http://bit.ly/mezuz17]

Do you think that you could spot an invalid mezuzah? Take a look at a copy of an error-free mezuzah online. [http://bit.ly/mezuz05] Then take the Mezuzah challenge. You'll find a mezuzah that at first glance looks pretty good. But according to the site it has 22 mistakes – one on each line. After you examine it, you can contact scribe Mordechai Pinchas, and he'll send you a list of the errors. [http://bit.ly/mezuz06]

Just don't think you'll be first to discover all the mistakes. That honour goes to "a visitor from Mexico, Aldo Zamudio, who found every error." The sofer writes that Zamudio's abilities are "a great example of knowledge crossing all barriers" because Zamudio isn't Jewish.

What's on your wall?

When our home was repainted shortly before my bar mitzvah, my parents asked me to choose the colour of my room. I selected a pale blue with a tint of green – a radical change from the previous variation of off-white. Every year or so during high school, I changed the artifacts hanging on my walls. I hung photos of family, pictures from camp, a poster of the Western Wall, a corkboard filled with notes, and, what covers my walls today, rows of bookshelves.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Jonny Ariel, a leader in Jewish and Zionist education, notes that what we hang on our walls is a public display of ourselves, a reflection of our identity. In college, many of my classmates hid their dorm's cinderblock walls behind flags: Israeli, Palestinian, British or rainbow. While flags may represent strong ideological beliefs, posters of impressionist paintings, Superman, or beautiful models also make a public statement.

Grandparents' homes often have two kinds of walls, both of which demonstrate their pride and sources of naches. One is filled with pictures of children and grandchildren in baby, bar mitzvah and wedding photos. Along with these, my wife's grandparents mounted framed copies of their children's and grandchildren's college diplomas. During my first visit to their apartment, they proudly introduced me to the rest of the family as if they were in the room.

The second wall displays communal ties. My bubbie-in-law framed and hung her lifetime membership to Hadassah, an organization she devoted much of her life to. This wall may include JNF certificates for trees planted in their honour or certificates of appreciation for volunteering. While it seems natural for our grandparents to hang these demonstrations of communal affiliation, my bar mitzvah certificate from JNF and leadership awards from Hillel are piled in a box in the basement. Until I started writing this column, it never occurred to me to hang them on a wall.

To today's young adults, walls aren't made of cinderblock or drywall. They're on Facebook. These digital walls parallel our fast-paced collaborative world. Rather than hanging new pictures every year or two, a Facebook wall changes daily, or even hourly. This rapid pace of change demonstrates the pace of changing adolescent identity.

Similarly, the owner no longer fully controls the wall's content. While I chose the colour of my room, virtual friends can post videos, photos and comments on my Facebook wall, adding their flavour to my identity. Teens carefully curate their walls by mixing their own posts with those of their friends. Like a Facebook wall, an adolescent identity is rapidly changing and shaped, in part, by peers.

Just like their drywall predecessors, virtual walls are indicators of identity. The language we use, the status updates, videos and photos we post, and even how often we make these changes project an image and identity. While the walls of my childhood room were only visible to those I let in, my virtual wall is open to many more to see. In recognizing virtual walls as public displays of identity, I must ask myself, do I know what's on my wall? What image am I projecting?

Antisemitism in hockey

Jason Bailey is currently a member of the Ottawa Senators American Hockey League affiliate, the Binghamton Senators.

Bailey, an Ottawa native, has been a part of his hometown organization for two years now, but it looks as if his National Hockey League dream is fading. Bailey has only played 17 games this season, recording no points and 11 penalty minutes.

In 2005, Bailey was drafted by the Anaheim Mighty Ducks, a dream come true for the Ottawa native, but ultimately a dream that would, six years later, lead him to a civil lawsuit against the club.

In the 2008-09 season, Bailey made his professional debut with the Bakersfield Condors, the Duck's former minor-league affiliate, playing 35 games with the team during that season. Bailey, who is best known for scrappy, physical play, was allegedly the target of antisemitic remarks made by the head coach Martin Raymond and assistant coach Mark Pederson.

One of the comments Raymond supposedly made to Jason was, "Maybe you should go fight in the war," after watching a CNN special on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Bailey is suing the Ducks for religious discrimination. His lawyer, Keith Fink, said, "They subjected Jason to a barrage of antisemitic comments, they froze him out from playing because of his Jewish faith. They didn't do the right thing and fire those coaches."

Since this case is in the courts, Bailey is unable to make any comments about it.

The NHL is also launching an internal investigation into the incident.

This is far from the first time antisemitism has made its way into professional sports.

On Campus

Justin Dahan

Perhaps the most famous antisemitic incident occurred in 1968 when several member of the Boston Bruins taunted Larry Zeidel about his faith. Zeidel lost his cool with Boston's Eddie Shack, and as a result the two of them swung sticks at each other's heads.

Not all Jewish hockey players have faced hardships like this in their careers. The NHL boasts more than a few Jewish hockey players. The Montreal Canadiens have two, Jeff Halpern and Michael Cammallari. Even Anaheim had one – Cory Pecker was on its AHL team for three seasons, though he did not have the same coaches as Bailey.

Most fans don't view professional sports as a place where prejudices still exist. It's good that Bailey got an issue that's usually swept under the rug into the public sphere.

In the past few years, the NHL has had problems with racial slurs. In 2007, New York Rangers forward Sean Avery was accused of yelling a racial slur at then-Pittsburgh Penguins forward Georges Laraque, who is of Haitian descent.

In early December 2010, a minor hockey coach was suspended because he pulled his team off the ice after one of his players was the target of a racial slur. The players involved in this incident were only 16 years old. The coach was reinstated within the month.

While racism is not common in the NHL, it does happen. The league has to be tough in dealing with incidents when they occur because racism doesn't belong in the sport. The league can help to eliminate racism from the professional game, and the minor leagues, too.

Respecting others is what God expects

I recently received an e-mail from a colleague entitled "Lost in Translation" regarding the label of an Israeli kosher grape juice. In part, the label read "without fear of shmittah [the seventh year in which the land is suppose to rest] and foreskin." Trying to understand what foreskin has to do with grape juice, I realized that orla in Hebrew means either foreskin or the first three years during which the produce of a tree may not be used in Israel. It really was lost in translation!

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

This same grape juice had two kosher certifications. This got me thinking that we spend a lot of time making sure the products we buy are kosher to the strictest standard, as they should be. It seems that when it comes to the mitzvot pertaining to our relationship with God, we also strive for perfection – often, however, without a commensurate effort with respect to our equally important relationships with our fellow human beings, although these relationships are often fraught with difficulties.

When God gave the Ten Commandments to the Jewish People, He gave five that deal with our relationship with God and five that deal with our relationships with our fellow human beings. The commandments were given together, because God wants us to understand that they are of equal importance.

God created us to make a better world, in part, by interacting justly and respectfully with other people. In some instances, it's more important to show sensitivity to our fellow human beings than to serve God in another way.

Rabbi Israel Salanter (1810-1883) was once invited to a rabbis' conference. When lunch was about to be served, the respected rabbi performed the ritual of washing hands. Many people gathered around him and saw that he washed his hands with the minimum amount of water required. When asked why, the elderly rabbi replied by asking who carries the water that's used for washing. When told that a servant did this, the rabbi asked why he should use a lot of water, thereby creating more work for another person, even if it was in the service of his Creator.

Rabbi Yosef Messas (1892-1974) was asked a question relating to an incident in synagogue one Shabbat morning. It seems that a mistake was found in a Sefer Torah, and by the time another Sefer Torah was taken out, people had started talking. One pious man asked them to be quiet. This created a commotion, leading to a fight. What should they do, the people asked the rabbi, if a similar incident should occur in the future?

Rabbi Messas replied that if it ever happened again, they should continue reading the same Sefer Torah, relying on the opinion of the Rambam, who permits this. Even though we usually don't rely on Maimonides' opinion in such a case, Rabbi Messas felt it better to keep peace and harmony among people than to take out another Sefer Torah.

Demonstrating respect and sensitivity toward others is extremely important, and it's what God expects of us. Let us remember to keep this in mind as we deal with others in all aspects of our lives.

'Tremendous talent' at MukiBaum centres' art exhibit

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

MukiBaum Treatment Centres' founder psychologist Nehama Baum has been helping children and adults with developmental disabilities and emotional disorders for more than three decades.

With eight group homes, an adult day treatment centre and a children's day treatment centre, MukiBaum serves about 175 people who cope with a combination of developmental disabilities and emotional and psychiatric disorders, such as autism, Down syndrome, schizophrenia, and bipolar disorder.

Baum said that over the years the centre has helped hundreds of people. While some people stay with MukiBaum all their lives, others eventually gain enough independence to be integrated into the school system, or get a job.

"Since I was young, I was interested in kids who are different from us, kids with disabilities," said Baum, adding that when she was a young woman living in Israel, she volunteered at an organization that helped children with cerebral palsy.

In 1958, Baum obtained a social-work degree with a specialization in therapy for families who have a child with cerebral palsy.

Just a year later, Baum's professional and family life collided when her son, Michael (Muki) Baum, was born deaf and with cerebral palsy.

MukiBaum Treatment Centres founder Nehama Baum stands next to a painting that will be featured in the Inner Treasures, Outer Expressions annual art exhibit opening March 3.

In an effort to provide her son with the best care, she decided to move to Canada in 1976.

After only a few years, her son became completely independent and eventually lived in his own apartment. Although Muki recently suffered a cervical spinal cord injury, which confined him to a wheelchair and forced him to move back in with his parents, he continues to contribute his time and effort to raise funds for the centre that bears his name.

Since Baum founded the organization, she has implemented the multi-focal approach she developed, which is based on the belief that you must evaluate the person as a whole, rather than just focus on the behaviour.

"One of the basic principles of the multi-focal approach is that we are not trying to fit a round peg into a square hole," Baum said. "Our job is to really figure out what is underneath the behaviour."

She added that the centres were structured to fulfil the needs of the MukiBaum community. For example, the adult day treatment centre provides its members with a 53,000-square-foot space that houses sensory, vocational and art programs that provide therapy through music, art, drama and sports.

"Another thing that is very important is that we don't look at the disability. I always say, 'We see the person, not the wheelchair… We look at the human being who is there. This really fits into everything we are doing.'"

She hopes that the annual art exhibit, Inner Treasures, Outer Expressions – which features art produced by members of the MukiBaum community – will help people appreciate that even those who cope with disabilities and disorders can be talented, contributing members of society.

"This is an opportunity to showcase their talents. We had tremendous success last year," Baum said, adding that more than 30 paintings from last year's exhibit hung in Lt.-Gov. David Onley's office at Queen's Park for months.

"I want people to realize that even people who are non-verbal can have tremendous talent. That, for me, is the mission of the art exhibit," Baum said. "It's beyond raising awareness – it's about appreciation."

This year's art exhibit opens on March 3 at the Centre for Ability Art Gallery in the adult treatment centre and it runs until the end of May. She said she hopes people from the art community will visit the exhibit and recognize the value of the art program.

Although MukiBaum is a government-funded institution that allows people to benefit from the centres without having to pay a fee, Baum said that most of the funding goes to paying the salaries of the professionals working at the centres. Funding for many of the programs come from private donations, most of which are raised at an annual fundraising gala. This year, The Possible Dream Gala will be held April 9 at the Riviera Parque Dining Banquet Centre in Concord, Ont.

"We cannot take everyone that really wants to come [to the centres]. It depends on whether we have the space or if there is funding," she said, adding that it costs about $12 million a year to run the centres.

Junction Shul celebrates 100th anniversary

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Congregation Knesseth Israel – better known as the Junction Shul – is gearing up for its 100th anniversary this September.

Festivities will begin with an invitation-only morning service on Thurs., Sept. 15, and conclude with a community open house/street celebration at the synagogue on Sun., Sept. 18 from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. There will also be an invitation-only Shabbat morning service, and a presentation on the history of the shul at the Ontario Jewish Archives on the Thursday evening.

As well, a documentary for the television show, Israel Today, is in the works, and the congregation is publishing a hard-cover commemorative book.

The synagogue was established in 1909 by Russian and Polish immigrants, who held services in a house on Maria Street at Runnymede Road. Two years later, construction began on the current synagogue, also on Maria Street. Services were first held there in 1913.

Edwin Goldstein, 80 – whose grandfather, the proprietor of a nearby hay and feed business, was a founder of the shul – has been shul president since 1983. He succeeded his late father, who served for 25 years. "I took this on as my contribution to the community," Goldstein said. "I want to make sure we keep this going."

The shul is Ontario's oldest purpose-built synagogue still in use, according to a historical plaque outside the building. The plaque was donated by Joey Tanenbaum, whose grandfather was a founding member, and his wife Toby.

Junction Shul president Edwin Goldstein has fond childhood memories of the congregation. [Frances Kraft photo]

The synagogue, which has been restored, is "pretty much as it was," said Goldstein, pointing out faux marble columns, and signs of the zodiac painted on the ceiling.

Shul members who were cabinetmakers, employed at the nearby Heintzman piano factory, built the dark, ornate wooden ark, he said.

The synagogue was "a vibrant place" where members would gather on a daily basis, Goldstein recalls, but he has no memory of the shul's first and only rabbi, Rabbi Mordecai Langner, who served from 1924 to 1939.

Now, services are held only on Jewish holidays and special occasions such as bar mitzvahs. Ba'al koreh Howard Kamen has been leading the services, which are traditional with Orthodox elements, since 1977.

Goldstein estimates there are currently 40 to 50 Jewish families living in the Junction – a neighbourhood named for the intersection of CN and CP railway lines – compared to about 200 at its height.

"This was the entry to the city," Goldstein said. "The produce would come here [to the West Toronto train station], and people who lived here could ply their work outside of the city.

About 100 families – mostly descendants of the founders – are "regular" members of the shul, and there are also more than 250 associate members.

Francine Dick, of the West Toronto Jewish Community Association, holds a family service at the shul on the High Holidays, geared to young people. As well, the association holds an annual potluck Passover seder. The shul's Sunday school is no longer operating, she said.

Lorne Miller – a writer who is working on the commemorative book with Neil Ross, a member of the West Toronto/Junction Historical Society – has spoken to more than 60 people about the shul.

Miller, who is not a member of the congregation, said he has collected pictures of some of the original members in front of their homes on Maria Street and in front of their stores nearby.

He's also been trying to obtain pictures and stories of members who served in the war. Those who volunteered in World War II are commemorated in a decorative certificate painted by Group of Seven member A.J. Casson in the 1940s.

"It's a very unusual congregation," said Miller. "The Junction really was like an old shtiebl because of the sense of cameraderie and family. Rich people, poor people – everybody was very close. One man, now in his 80s, was orphaned, but the congregation took him under its wing."

More recently, he added, a Rosh Chodesh service was organized a few months ago to coincide with the last day of shiva for a congregant. The entire congregation walked the mourner around the block to mark the end of the shiva, Miller said. "It gives you a feeling of the type of closeness that has remained in that synagogue for 100 years."

Anniversary committee member Bob Pomerantz, an associate member who lives seven minutes by car from the shul, became involved when he moved to Roncesvalles in 1987. "Probably the reason I really have a warm spot for the place [is that] it's informal. There's no snootery or snobbery. There's a nice mix of people. You feel totally welcome," he said.

To contribute wartime stories or pictures for the commemorative book, contact Lorne Miller at mystories@rogers.com or by phone at 416-226-1022.

Schochets honoured for five decades of leadership

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Immanuel Schochet and his wife, Jettie will be honoured later this month by Toronto's Congregation Beth Joseph Lubavitch.

Although he's spiritual leader of the 100-family congregation – a responsibility he describes as part-time – he never sought a pulpit career, he said in a recent interview at his home.

A prolific author whose expertise on Jewish philosophy and mysticism have taken him as far afield as Europe, South Africa and Australia on the lecture circuit, Rabbi Schochet was a professor of philosophy at Humber College from 1972 to 1997 and taught medical ethics at the University of Toronto's faculty of medicine at the same time.

The couple, who knew each other as youngsters in Holland, are being honoured for more than 50 years of leadership to the Jewish community. Their tribute dinner will take place Feb. 27 at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

Jettie's father, a businessman, was instrumental in bringing Rabbi Schochet's father to Holland to serve as chief rabbi of the Hague. Both families left in 1951 – the Schochets came to Toronto when the future rabbi was 15, and Jettie was 11 when her family moved to Dublin.

Rabbi Schochet, a native of Switzerland, completed his education at yeshiva in New York, where he obtained smichah.

"Immanuel used to learn with my father and grandfather," Jettie recalled of their days in Holland.

Being four years her husband's junior, she had little contact with her future husband until he visited Dublin in 1959. "The rest was history," he said, smiling. They married in 1962, settling in Toronto, where the rabbi focused initially on finishing his BA and teaching at Jewish schools to earn a living. He was already rabbi of the Kielcer Congregation, a position he held for 36 years.

After he completed his undergraduate studies, the rabbi continued his education at McMaster University and the University of Waterloo, where he earned his doctorate.

In the mid-1960s, Jettie became a founder of Meginei Chanah, an organization that teaches young brides about family purity. As well, she has co-ordinated the women's chevra kadisha for 30 years and also volunteers at Baycrest in palliative care.

A sixth-generation native of Holland, Jettie was hidden with a Protestant minister and his family for 2-1/2 years during the war. From the time she was a young teenager, she was involved with Jewish youth work. "I loved being with kids," she said.

Once her youngest child began school full-time, Jettie started to work as a substitute teacher at Eitz Chaim Day Schools' preschool. "I loved it," she said of the 20 years she spent there.

Reflecting on the advantages of not being a full-time pulpit rabbi, Rabbi Schochet said he has the "freedom to say what I want, to do what I want… I could make controversial statements which other rabbis would be scared to make. My livelihood was not on the line."

Among the causes he has taken on is the fight against Christian missionaries, which he began in the early 1970s, personally talking many young Jews out of their involvement in cults and Christian missionary groups.

As well, he has addressed the issue of "who is a Jew?" and dealt with "internal issues" among Orthodox and non-Orthodox segments of the community.

Punching the air with his fist for emphasis, he said, "When I see something that is wrong, I have no hesitation to speak out.

"But not everyone can do that," he qualified. "I don't even blame many of the other rabbis for not doing so."

Rabbi Schochet's forthrightness has, on occasion, brought him into conflict with other rabbis – particularly non-Orthodox ones, he said – but, on the whole, he's had "cordial, good relationships" with most of them. He and Rabbi Gunther Plaut – who served Holy Blossom Temple – respected one another, Rabbi Schochet said.

Jettie and Rabbi Immanuel Schochet

Although he believes in "a golden middle path," Rabbi Schochet said there are some things on which there can be no compromise.

"If something could and should be corrected, we should not shirk from our responsibility to do so," he said.

Assimilation is the biggest issue facing the Jewish community today, he believes. "Too many compromises are made by official organizations. They think by giving in here, giving in there, you will gain… which is not true. You keep chipping away at your own base, so you have to stand firm on basic issues affecting Jewish identity, Jewish consciousness."

Rabbi Schochet said there are many inconsistencies and "a lot of hypocrisy" in the Orthodox community as well as in the non-Orthodox world. "I would condemn [both] the same way.

"There's nothing wrong with having a good controversy, as long as you are honest about it, you state where you stand, and have some kind of defence for what you said."

ENVIRONMENTALLY FRIENDLY: As part of a waste audit project at Associated Hebrew School's Kamin Education Centre in Thornhill, students are working toward litterless and "boomerang" lunches. This means they try to bring food in re-usable containers and plastic is put back into lunch boxes and taken home. Those who bring litter-less lunches become part of the Eco Hero Club and receive badges of recognition. Receiving their hero badges are, from left, Daphne Baron, Lior Barron, Noa Suroghon and Patrick Wikler.

READING BUDDIES: Kindergarten student Aaron Kriss, left, is treated to a story by Grade 3 student Eli Purdy-Flacks as part of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School's Reading Buddies program, in which older students are partnered with younger ones to foster literacy skills and a love of reading.

The unique proposal story

Andrea Kane
Special to The CJN

Howard has many connections in the entertainment and event planning industry, which enabled him to come up with a very romantic plan when he decided to propose to Andrea.

Howard called up his good friend Jordan Morra – the owner of the Warehouse Event Venue – to discuss using his venue as a possible location for the proposal. Jordan agreed. Together, they came up with a plan.

They thought it would be a great idea to create a "make believe" client meeting at the Warehouse. Howard would have to be a part of the meeting as he was supposed to be the DJ at the wedding. At this "meeting," there would also be a taste testing, a setup of the banquet table, and an example of how the décor in the hall would look like on the day of the wedding.

Challenge: to get Andrea to the location

Andrea helps out at Howard's T's Burger Bar every night, but this night was different than all others. When she arrived at the restaurant, she noticed he was not there, which was unusual. She contacted him to see where he was. He told her he had to go make a delivery at a school. Once Howard returned to the restaurant, about an hour later, he told Andrea he had to go to the Warehouse for a client meeting and that she would be joining him. She thought nothing of it and was excited to go and be part of the meeting.

Once the couple arrived at the Warehouse, they found a beautiful table setup with candles, and flowers everywhere. It was the perfect setup for the perfect proposal, but little did Andrea know that this was for her. She was told this was for the "client meeting" and believed it! About 10 minutes later, Jordan got an imaginary call from the clients saying that they had to cancel. Jordan got upset because he had worked so hard and had so much food that he didn't want to go to waste.

He asked Andrea and Howard if they were hungry and if they would join him to eat the food. They agreed. The couple sat at the table and waited for Jordan to bring out the food. When Jordan came back to the table, he arrived with two champagne glasses in hand,

Andrea began to have a feeling that something was up. Noticing something sparkly and beautiful in her champagne glass, she immediately handed the glass to Howard, who gulped down the champagne, took out the ring, got down on one knee and said, "Andrea Kane, will you marry me?" Delighted and excited, she said yes.

The proposal was done, but the night wasn't over. Howard had arranged for his favourite singer, Paul Knight, to serenade them with a few songs as they enjoyed a three- course meal. Howard had also enlisted the help of his good friend Jodi to take pictures of the proposal and come up with the décor for the night.

So on Nov. 24, Howard Thomas Rosenberg and Andrea Dara Kane became engaged in the most perfect, romantic, and extravagant setting of their lives!

Couple celebrates their 60th anniversary

Debra Stuart
Special to The CJN

Sol and Belle Zulauf celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary in Toronto on Oct. 21, 2010.

Sol was born on July 2, 1922, in Coney Island, New York, and moved to Montreal shortly after with his four brothers and sisters. A stellar athlete, he played centre field on the YMHA baseball team, the only Jewish amateur team to win a city championship.

In 1942, Sol enlisted in the Canadian army and spent three years in the Royal Canadian Ordinance Corp, travelling to England, Belgium, Holland, Germany and France, where he saw action and landed on Normandy.

The 85-year-old Belle, born Sept. 9, 1925, grew up in Toronto's Kensington Market with her three sisters and younger brother. Her European immigrant parents owned a variety store downtown.

After returning to civilian life in March 1945, Sol moved to Toronto, where he met Belle at a singles dance. "She was wearing a lime green dress and had a beautiful figure," Sol fondly recollects.

"I asked her to dance. She was a fantastic jitterbugger," he says with affection. They married 18 months later. A furrier by trade and now a retired taxicab owner, Sol said, "I love my wife and loved dancing with her since the day we met." Belle said, "Sol is the most good-natured person in the world. He's easygoing and very funny. He loves to make people laugh."

At a recent appointment with a new gerontologist, Sol sat quietly for a long time, listening to the doctor speak about his expertise treating patients like Sol with dementia. Sol politely interjected, "You know, doc, I also took medicine for four years." The doctor said, "Really? Where did you go to school?" Sol replied with a mischievous grin, "No, I wasn't feeling well." The doctor laughed, and said it was inspiring to see that, at age 88, Sol still had a great sense of humour.

Belle was a stay at home mother, who devoted herself to raising her children Debra Stuart, Randi Goodman and Leslie Zulauf. She happily went back to the workforce part-time when she was in her early 50s and held office administrative positions for several businesses including the State of Israel Bonds National Office, as well as a federal government corporation. Her lightning-fast typing and organizational proficiency awed her employers. Renowned for her knitting and singing talents; she is still an excellent Scrabble player and baker.

Residing together in their Thornhill, Ont. condominium, braving the numerous daily struggles of aging and its inherent afflictions, Belle and Sol derive their greatest pleasure from spending time with their grandchildren and the rest of their family. They can often be seen sitting together chatting on their patio, or walking, very slowly and affectionately, hand-in-hand.

transform your Wedding Day into an ultimate dream come true...

We are still married seven years later

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

In Judaism, seven represents wholeness, nature, the entirety of creation. Seven days, and God rested... does that mean we can rest from creating our marriage? Fat chance.

I already had two kids when we married, which means we now have two teenagers plus two kids together... and putting off a real honeymoon for a few more years.

It also means we're tired. Our neighbours just had their first baby, and it's fun to watch the unabashed adoration they toss at him so casually. He is truly the centre of their world, just as, before he came along, I suppose they were the centre of each other's world.

It's funny: I wrote about Ted a lot before we got married – about our interfaith relationship before he converted, about introducing him to my kids. Then, he pulled a veil over my face, met me at the chupah... and I've written nothing about him since.

We've both been too busy to catch our breath.

For seven years, we have literally been creating a world, a universe in microcosm: spheres orbiting, trying not to crash, dodging meteor showers and the occasional black hole.

A few years back, my parents celebrated their 40th anniversary; Ted's parents are long past 50. Married older, I know we will probably not have all those years together. But 50 per cent of marriages don't even make it this long. Those statistics are skewed. Fresh marriages are more likely to succeed; the doomed ones are like ours: complicated, messy slogging.

In Garrison Keillor's short story We Are Still Married, a wife trumpets mundane details of life with her ordinary husband to a sensationalistic press. "He walks around humming the same tune over and over... he taps his foot in his sleep." For months, she slanders him bizarrely in magazines and on TV. Finally, quietly, she returns home in the spring.

This is marriage: every detail grotesque and irksome, but ultimately, not unforgivable. Pessimism, or optimism? "We are still married."

But eight! On Chanukah, the menorah burned eight days; we wait eight days to circumcise a boy. If seven represents reality, eight transcends. It is the miracles that have brought us to our eighth year and will guide us beyond.

May we be granted the serenity to pause, if only for a nice, quiet supper together, and forgive each other our forgivable sins... before plunging headlong back into the universe we've built together.

IT'S NEVER TOO LATE

Yaakov Manloon, 97, and his wife, Ora, 84, a couple from the B'nai Menashe community of Jews in India, recently immigrated to Israel. They took part in a traditional Jewish marriage ceremony under the chupah shortly after their arrival in Israel. The B'nai Menashe community is regarded by some as belonging to one of the 10 "lost tribes" of Israel that were taken into exile under Assyrian captivity 27 centuries ago.

Windsor Arms Hotel's inimitable cachet produces lasting afterglow

The vibrancy of a downtown setting so close to the city's epicentre you can feel its heart beat.

The cachet that for decades has made it the destination of celebrities worldwide, from movie stars to heads of state.

A level of sophistication found in only a handful of hotels worldwide.

If one place can be said to seamlessly synthesize grandeur and intimacy under one roof, the Windsor Arms is that place. Voted Toronto's #1 Hotel and in the world's top five by Condé Nast Traveller Magazine, the Hotel stands as a symbol of the city's history, embodying the essence of postmodern chic with the conveniences of today. Tucked away on tranquil St. Thomas Street, mere steps from Yorkville in the heart of Toronto's most fashionable shopping and entertainment district, the Windsor Arms is close to the hustle and bustle, yet a million miles away. Every detail evokes the gentility of a bygone era and radiates the kind of old-world charm that is born, not made.

Behind its century-old portals are 28 newly appointed luxury suites with 24-hour butler service. Discreet luxury, combined with an exceptional level of service, place it in a class of one among Toronto hotels. Your search for The Five Star destination starts and stops at the Windsor Arms. This status is repeatedly reconfirmed by visiting celebrities and heads of state, all of whom call the Windsor Arms their home away from home.

For owner George Friedmann, who in 1999 purchased the property and restored it to its former glory while adding state-of-the-art amenities like a Kosher kitchen, swimming pool, exercise room and full-service spa, the operative word is passion. "You can teach skills, but you can't teach passion," he opines. "Do you want to be served by someone who's going through the motions, or someone who really cares about your dining experience?"

The Windsor Arms' Courtyard Café: where limestone and 50 foot ceiling grandeur and intimacy intertwine

They have to. Unlike banquet halls where your event is often one of many and where you're one and done — unlikely to return save an invitation to someone else's simcha — the Windsor Arms wants you to come back in the days, weeks and months following your affair. No resting on laurels here; the culinary team lives by the restauranteur's adage — you're only as good as your last meal. "We're here to ensure that the most significant day of your life has a lasting afterglow," underscores Friedmann. "One that will keep you coming back to relive those magic moments again and again."

At the Windsor Arms, those moments consist of breakfast, lunch, dinner, and the afternoon and twilight tea for which it has become so popular that weekend tea times — at ease, golfers — often need to be reserved months in advance.

Before you can return to the Windsor Arms, however, you actually have to leave — a sweet sorrow the host establishment manages to delay as long as possible. "I wish this night would never end. How often have you heard that? How often haven't you heard it? Here, it doesn't have to," exudes Friedmann. "Why break the spell by stepping into a parking lot when you can stroll into the Tea Room, slide into the Spa, or sip champagne in the Bar or in your suite?"

Nor need you doff the glass slipper in the morning, when the grand Sunday Buffet Brunch beckons you and your guests. "Continuity," says Friedmann. "Your event doesn't end when the next party needs the banquet hall because there is no next party. We hold one event at a time: yours."

Of such beginnings are happily-ever-afters made...

Friedmann should know. Five-a-week breakfasts at the Windsor Arms fuelled a growing fascination with the venue that led to its acquisition. "I had to buy the place just to save money on breakfasts," he grins.

On a serious note, Friedmann says he's proud that a facility of this ilk can still host a wedding for as little as $65 per person.

Sixty-five dollars per person? And all custom created to suit your palate.

"That's right", says Friedmann. "We're elite, but not elitist. We've hosted $500,000 weddings, but here world-class is a given regardless of your budget. Whether you're two for Afternoon Tea or 250 for a gala affair, we pay attention to detail. Every detail."

Such singular focus is part and parcel of preserving and nurturing the aura of exclusivity with which the Windsor Arms is perceived. And now if you prefer a country setting for your simcha or spa/golf/conference getaway, the Windsor Arms has a magnificent sister property in the Kawarthas.

That special someone is out there for everyone

Jackie Sherkey
Special to The CJN

"If I have to go on one more mind-numbing first date, I'm going to scream!" I said to my family at our weekly Friday night dinner.

I had been on yet another bad first date. After years of trying online dating sites, attending Shabbat services at a variety of synagogues, and having countless fix-ups, I still had not met that special someone.

One Saturday night in the summer, I went to a friend of a friend's birthday. I began talking to a new girl that I had met that evening. We became acquaintances and I would see her periodically. She would always ask me how my dating life was going.

"Slow," I would tell her.

One night she opened up her phone to scan down her list of contacts and see if she knew anyone with whom to set me up.

"I think [David Schwartz] would be great for you" she said and told me that she would pass my number along to him. A month later, he finally called. We had a great conversation on the phone and decided to get together for a quick drink. Our first meeting was outstanding! Finally, here was a guy I could have a conversation with and laugh with, one who shared a lot of my interests. We began to date more seriously, and the more I got to know him, the more I liked him.

After about three months of dating, he told me he loved me and we talked about our future plans. I knew that this relationship was completely different from all of my previous ones because he listened attentively to what I said, shared his life's ambitions with me, and every moment we spent together made me happy.

After almost a year of dating he proposed, and now we are planning our wedding for July 2011.

I think about how my life has changed so much in just one year. Not long ago, I was complaining about not being able to find anyone with whom I connected. Now I am excited to be planning my wedding with the most perfect guy in the whole world. I am in disbelief that my life has changed so much for the better and I am a true believer of never giving up, because the perfect guy is out there for everyone!

Respect key to lasting relationships

Jason Abram
Special to The CJN

My father, Alvin Abram, tells a story about dating a girl from Buffalo that he met at Crystal Beach when he was 21. He drove to Buffalo to spend Sunday with her, only to learn she didn't want to see him again.

Depressed, he returned to Toronto and went to the Y on Bloor Street. Sitting in the lounge, he thought about telling his mother he had been rejected by the love of his life.

Just then, his younger brother Mort walked in with several of his friends. Among them was a 15-year-old girl who stuttered, was slightly overweight and very shy. My father is an extrovert. She was everything he wasn't, but despite the odds they became a couple.

When Marilyn was 17, she asked my father to marry her. He joked it was because she loved him too much to wait, but later learned she had problems with her mother.

On the last day of their honeymoon, my father learned the truth about his new wife. As they prepared to leave Cypress Garden in Florida, Marilyn began to cry. My father tried to comfort her, but she couldn't stop crying. Apparently he told her, "Don't cry. The honeymoon is never over as long as we love each other."

She stopped crying. "I have a confession. You know all those things my mother told you I cooked for you? I never did. I can't cook. My mother wouldn't let me do anything!"

My father said he was shocked. Finally, he said to her, "If you learn to cook I'll eat it, no matter how awful it tastes."

That is the way it's been through their 50 years of marriage. When either had a problem, the other helped resolve it. When I asked for his formula for a successful marriage, he said, "Respect is another name for love. As long as there is respect for each other, there will be love. And we can build on respect, because respect is a building block. Your mother is now a gourmet cook. She kept her word. The formula is simple – always keep your word, or at least make an honest effort."

'Matchmaker, matchmaker make me a match'

Marni Brinder Byk
Special to The CJN

Everyone knows the famous lines from Fiddler on the Roof: "Matchmaker, matchmaker, make me a match/ Find me a find, catch me a catch!" It might not occur to many Jewish singles to use a matchmaker, but it may be a way for them to meet Mr. or Ms. Right and it could be the answer to their future happiness.

Two Toronto-area matchmakers are actively coupling Jewish singles and offering personalized service.

Tova of Happy Time Matchmaking (647-895-3371) said that her "approach is simple – I work the old-fashioned way, without the Internet. I interview each and every one of my clients during a meeting face to face in order to find the right match for them. I am here to help."

Tova has been making matches for ten years and offers a confidential service for Jewish singles who can be anywhere from their 20s to their 70s. She also caters to people who speak Hebrew.

Two of her clients, whose names have been changed at their request, have found success using her method.

Malka, a widow of three years and in her 60s, decided to contact Tova at the advice of a friend who was successful using her services. Malka, who doesn't use the Internet, registered with Tova and was introduced to a widower she's been dating for several months.

Malka is not looking for marriage and finds her match appropriate for her current situation. "It's nice to have companionship," she said.

Alex used Happy Time Matchmaking five years ago and met his wife thanks to Tova. He believes they couldn't have met otherwise – they never hung out at the same places. Alex said that Tova did "a beautiful job." He and his wife now have a one-month-old daughter.

Once a client completes a Happy Time registration form – any information given is strictly confidential – Tova requests a current photograph, which will be shown to prospective matches only.

Tova prides herself on working with people one to one, and when she meet a client, she talks him or her through the process and the application.

Currently, Happy Time Matchmaking has an 80 per cent success rate.

Matchmakers consult with one another to find the most suitable mate for their client, and the success of a matchmaker depends, in part, on networking.

Eve Potok, president of Soulmates Introduction Services Inc. (905-709-3868), has been a matchmaker since 1990. She uses the Internet to introduce Jewish singles from throughout North America and Israel who are interested in finding love and companionship. Potok said Soulmates is like "MLS for Jewish singles."

Her website, www.soulmates.net, offers free online registration, and any information clients give is kept completely confidential. Soulmates' extensive database is filled with pictures and profiles that are matched. Potok said that her job is to "make the search for your love an easy and pleasant experience."

Soulmates is launching a newly updated website in February, which will feature a social-networking application. You can also join Soulmates Introduction Services Inc.'s group on Facebook.

When a client registers on www.soulmates.net, she/he uploads a recent photo and completes an extensive questionnaire. Then Potok works on a match through her database, often networking with other professional matchmakers to make sure clients are matched accurately.

Potok said her clients need to be "committed to the process," whether they are registering for matchmaking services or signing up for Soulmates' free online dating site for people who prefer to take care of themselves. Many of her clients are Jewish singles in their 20s, but she has clients of all ages. Potok works over the phone with clients who are not Internet savvy.

Soulmates also offers an image-consulting service and spiritual guidance for clients in their quest for love.

When asked what message Potok would like to convey to Jewish singles leery of using her services, she said, "You have nothing to lose and everything to gain!"

Mom and Dad's wedding story

Heather Kaplan
Special to The CJN

When my mother and father met, it was totally by accident. My mom, Anne, was visiting her girlfriend on Oxford Street, while my father, Harold Goldman, was sitting in the hall of the same house, waiting for the fellow upstairs to return home with a book that he borrowed from him. They saw each other, and since my dad is a head shorter than my mom and had acne, she was not attracted to him at all. They were both only 16 years old.

Dad eventually found my mother's address on Oxford Street and asked her out to a costume party. He dressed as "The Shadow" and she, as a princess. After the first date, Mom never wanted to see Dad again.

A couple of years later, when Mom was coming home from work at Enchin Leather, she spotted Dad, handsomely dressed in his army uniform, now tall, moustached and looking a bit like Clark Gable. She claims that when she got off the streetcar at her stop, Dad followed her home, but according to Dad, it was the opposite. I guess now it was love at first sight.

Before Dad went overseas, he instructed my grandmother to have my mom over for Friday night dinner every week before he returned home – in order to keep an eye on her, I am guessing. Mom was very popular and had many dates, which Dad knew, so he tried his utmost to keep her coming to his house on Beatrice Street so she could get to know his family, including his two married sisters, Marsha and Anita, even though he was not around.

Before the war in Europe was over, Dad enlisted to fight in the Pacific against the Japanese, but by the time he was shipped back to Canada, the entire war was over. So, a date was booked at the Kiever Synagogue for the end of November for my parent's wedding, but unfortunately someone else wanted that date, so it was changed to Dec. 2, 1945.

The wedding was very large for those days, about 200 guests, and according to family legend, liquor at the time was scarce, so my uncle, David Grey, hid a bottle of whisky under his jacket and went around pouring and filling up glasses. Wedding pictures were taken, but most of them were lost, which was the fault of the photographer, and there are only three remaining.

Mom and Dad just celebrated their 65th wedding anniversary this year. They are blessed with four daughters, four sons-in-law, grandchildren and great-grandchildren who wish them a very hearty mazel tov and much love for many more happy and healthy years to come.

Communication tools for better relationships

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

With the divorce rate in North America hovering at over 50 percent, it's clear that many couples are having a major problem when it comes to communication. It seems ironic that's the one place they're foundering, given all the tools we have to communicate today: cell phones, texting, Facebook, email – as a population, we're communicating more than ever, and all the time. But not necessarily in the ways that count, says Tami Kulbatski, a Toronto-based psychologist who specializes in positive psychology and relationships.

"It's not about what you have, but about what you do with what you have," she insists. "People really need to wrap their brains around the idea that their digital device can be used as an adjunct communication tool in their relationship, but it can't replace one-to-one face time."

The challenge is to carve out a space for shared time together, undistracted by the myriad tangents that intersect our lives. "People don't realize that if they don't take the time to make their relationship a priority, everything else will suffer. They're forgetting how to put their partner and their relationship first," she explains.

Kulbatski sees many couples wait too long before seeking emotional help. By the time they show up at her door, one or both of them has all ready "checked out emotionally," she says. "By then it's a last ditch effort. The couples who come in earlier have a much higher success rate."

We can all use tips on improving our communication tools with significant others in our lives. Habits develop easily, blame becomes a part of our vocabulary and things can deteriorate rapidly in the absence of good communication skills. Where to start? Right here.

•Make A Date: On average, couples spend a mere 27 minutes per week engaged in real communication. We're not talking about the 'pay the bills' discussion, or the 'carpool the kids' dialogue, but real, meaningful talk about how we're feeling, our hopes for the weekend or our need to connect in a spiritual, romantic or practical way with one another. "I encourage couples to take ten minutes a day to sit down together, share their thoughts, hopes and dreams and make sure there are no distractions like cell phones, children or television," she says. "Give each other the gift of your undivided attention by having a ten-minute "Tea for Two" time daily, or even better, by scheduling a weekly date. Taking the time to have fun and connect is so important."

•Listen Properly: Your partner's talking and your mind is elsewhere, because let's face it, you have a lot on your mind. One way to stay focused and make sure you truly listen is to paraphrase what they told you, in order to confirm that what they said is what you heard. "The point is that you want confirmation from your partner that you've successfully captured their message," Kulbatski says.

•Say "I", not "You": Start a sentence with the word "You" and people often feel threatened or accused, which makes them defensive. So next time you're inclined to say "You hurt me," phrase it differently. A better way might be to say "I felt hurt when you did this." "People can listen more effectively when they don't feel like they're being threatened or accused," Kulbatski says.

•In Good Times & Bad: Being a partner is an immediate job in cheerleading. We know how important it is to be there in the bad times, providing comfort and solace. But sometimes we forget about the good times. "One way to increase the positivity in the relationship is to use Active Constructive Responses," Kulbatski says. When something good happens to your partner, show a lot of enthusiasm, demonstrate support, convey interest and ask a lot of questions. "Couples who celebrate each other's successes report they feel more marital satisfaction," she says.

•The 5:1: An examination of successful relationships shows that for every one negative exchange there are at least five positive ones. "It's a formula that seems to work," Kulbatski says. "If you criticize or hurt your partner's feelings, it's imperative you strive to make up for it with five expressions of positivity such as kindness, warmth and affection."

•Make Requests, not Criticisms: Instead of attacking your partner by pointing out their shortcomings, rephrase and ask for what you want. For example, instead of saying, 'you forgot to pay the bills, you're so irresponsible,' try something like 'could you put a reminder on your cell phone to pay the bills a week before they're due?' Phrased this way, your request may go further in attaining compliancy from your partner.

In a society of instant gratification and quick disposability, couples tend to give up on relationships and marriages too easily, cautions Kulbatski. "Focus on the quality of your communication, and remember that nothing takes the place of sitting together and sharing time," she suggests. That includes your iPhone, Blackberry or laptop computer. "Affect and emotion is lost in digital communication," she adds. "It's not the same as being able to hear the softness in your partner's voice or the feeling of your hand in theirs."

Wedding showers celebrate the cycles of life

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

Isn't there some archaic maxim that every occasion honoring your wedding be forever etched in your memory? Then why can't I remember any details of my own wedding shower?

Well, I do remember one thing – carefully opening the presents – knowing that my best friend, Mary, would be dutifully recording my every utterance, later to be read out loud so guests could titter at the double entendres. But for the life of me I can't remember where it was or what we ate, and I certainly didn't feel that a life-altering event had just taken place.

Fast forward to 2000, when my sister-in-law talked to me about the concept of mikvah and later that year when I read Anita Diamant's novel The Red Tent. The book, set in ancient times, illuminates the beauty of ancient Jewish rituals and the power of the camaraderie of women. It quietly nudges us to embrace their customs, even if we reinterpret them for the 21st century.

Since that time I have celebrated life-changing events, including wedding showers, in more meaningful ways, but I have often thought how empowering it would be to host such an occasion in a mikvah.

When I spoke to Diamant by phone from Boston, she told me people are doing just that, especially since non-affiliated, non-denominational mikvahs are being built all over the country, including the mikvah she helped build in Boston; Mayyim Hayyim: Living Waters Community Mikvah and Education Center.

"The mikvah is being reclaimed and reinvented," Diamant said. Since it is defined as a pool of living water that one submerges themselves to mark a transitional moment in one's life, it seems the perfect place for the celebration.

In Diamant's book, The New Jewish Wedding, the prolific author describes how the Sephardic custom of turning mikvah into a joyful party has inspired new rituals and celebrations – from the bride arriving at the mikvah with five friends and a basket of food and wine, who wait for her in the foyer while she immerses and then greet her with songs, champagne and sweets.

Another group of women gathered in a swimming hole, made a circle around the bride and all immersed themselves. While in the water, they wished for it to wash away the bride's self doubts, and then they praised her abilities, talents and beauty.

At another gathering, shower guests anointed their "wedding queen" with the gift of scents. Each one brought a pure distilled oil of a favorite fragrance.

"There are many ways to bestow a bride with blessings," said Diamant. "You can give them favorite recipes, share advice and stories about marriage. Some people might want to write stories for the bride or even create a memory book," she added.

When I spoke to Rabbi Lauren Grabelle Herrmann of Kol Tzedek in west Philadelphia, she reminded me that going to a mikvah before your wedding day is already an ancient custom, so using this ritual creates an opportunity for greater meaning. Entering the water is a reference to birth, she said, and coming out new or cleansed is a rebirth, getting ready for a new cycle of your life. It's a moment of transcendence.

A bridal shower to remember

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

Something old, something new,
Something borrowed, something blue,
And a lucky sixpence in her shoe…
Anonymous

For years, this adage has sent mothers of the bride, maids of honour – even concerned second cousins – scurrying about town to locate the perfect antique veil, wedding dress, second-hand handkerchief, baby blue garter and lucky penny to bestow upon the bride for her walk down the aisle. These traditional things have been guaranteeing good luck since time immemorial.

Now all that fuss is fun, but Sadie Sadie married lady still needs her espresso maker and her salmon poacher. And, as one modern bride so desperately wanted – her picnic table that folds up and fits into a bag. That's where the bridal shower comes in. And you were nice enough to offer to host a luncheon.

But instead of spending upward of $30 a person and having guests complain about prosaic pasta and commonplace chicken at a trendy restaurant, or hiring a caterer to tramp through your house and dirty up your kitchen, how about serving our delicious "do-able" menu and toasting the bride with a glass of your favourite champagne (no outrageous prices or corkage fee) in your own garden?

You'll not only save beaucoup de bucks you'll kvell from your cleverness. And send Sadie down the aisle with the comforting thought that when it comes time for her to host a shower, she knows who to call for help. Now that's a gift that keeps on giving.

And the best part, putting on a perfect party will bring Sadie just as much luck – and everything she registered for – as that silly sixpence in her shoe.

Since Los Angeles cooking teacher and party coordinator Jean Brady's company, L.A. Celebrations, has catered over 500 showers and weddings, we called upon her to guide us through what can potentially be a daunting endeavour.

A visit to Brady in her gadget-filled kitchen, with its picture windows providing views of the lush garden where she entertains, finds her bustling about the kitchen, testing recipes for a bridal shower. She brims over with advice as she offers a sip of Roasted Yellow Pepper Soup, a bite of Rosemary Bread with Dried Cherries, a taste of Pot De Crème Au Café. In between these delectable delights she explains how we can host our own luncheon but make it look like she did it for us.

Getting started

Decide upon a theme. Since showers are all about bestowing the bride with gifts for her new home, why not take your cue from her taste – whether it be Victorian, country or modern – and design the flowers, the decorations and even the music accordingly.

Choose your menu, then make a timeline of what to do when, including shopping, preparing, cleaning the house and setting the tables. In Brady's suggested menu, most items can be prepared in advance, making your luncheon more fun than work.

Make a list of dishes, flatware and glassware for each person, and of platters, bowls and serving pieces for each dish. If they're not in your closet, beg, borrow or find on sale what you'll need.

Brady's helpful hints

Tablecloths and napkins can be matching or contrasting. A pretty way of presenting napkins is to shake one down the middle, then tie it with a ribbon, variegated ivy and a rose. Or fasten it with a ribbon and a sprig of herbs.

A wonderful party favour is a cruet or wine split of homemade blackberry vinegar tied with raffia. If you attach a name tag to each one, it serves a double purpose.

A lovely way of serving butter is in individual soufflé dishes with a herb sprig on top. Rosemary, basil or Italian parsley are pretty and smell wonderful.

Serve salad dressing in attractive cruets or sauceboats with a ladle. Don't dress the salad in advance or your crisp greens will turn into a soggy mess.

Set up a separate table specifically for the gifts.

Have a table of simple appetizers available for guests when they arrive. We packed wide-mouthed vases with cherry tomatoes and black olives. Alongside, we filled dishes with nuts including pistachios, almonds and cashews.

Time savers

Soup: can be made up to 3-4 days in advance and refrigerated. Don't add cream until the last minute.
Salad: vegetables can be prepped several hours before the luncheon.
Avocado: peel 2-3 hours in advance but don't slice. Wrap in plastic until ready to use.
Asparagus: blanch, cut and leave at room temperature for a few hours before using.
Baby lettuce: just before serving, submerge in ice water for a few minutes until cold and crisp, then either spin dry in salad spinner or blot with paper towel.
Mango: peel skin with vegetable peeler and cut chunks off pit; or peel skin with peeler, score lengthwise and crosswise, then cut as close to pit as possible to release. You may place chunks in covered bowl in refrigerator for several hours before serving.
Tarragon: should be as fresh as possible. Wash well to loosen dirt.
Grapes: wash well to get rid of pesticide residual. Keep in refrigerator until just before assembling salad.
Bread: can be baked up to 3 weeks in advance, frozen, then defrosted at room temperature.
Pot de crème: can be made 2-3 days in advance, then set in coldest part of refrigerator. Let sit outside refrigerator 1/2 hour before serving.

ROASTED YELLOW PEPPER SOUP

From Jean Brady. Since our soup is served at room temperature, it can be poured and waiting for guests to arrive. Serve in individual soup bowls, preferably with handles, with matching or contrasting liners. The pale orange of the soup garnished with purple violas, violets or pansies looks like a painting. When eating flowers always make sure they are unsprayed.

15 roasted, peeled yellow peppers, sliced thin
8 carrots, scrubbed and diced
8 shallots, peeled and diced
4 sweet onions, peeled and coarsely chopped
4 cloves garlic, peeled and chopped
1 stick unsalted butter for sautéing
1 1/2 tbsp. fresh tarragon, chopped
8 cups vegetable stock
salt and pepper to taste
dash ground chili powder
1 1/2 to 2 cups cream
20 edible violets, purple pansies or violas for garnish.

Sauté vegetables in butter until carrots are tender. Add stock, salt, pepper and chili powder. Simmer, covered, about 20 minutes. Puree vegetables and fresh tarragon; add cream to achieve desired consistency. Taste and adjust seasonings. Just before serving, place a flower in the centre of each bowl. Serves 20.
